Advertisers aim to rebuild beliefs in '92

By Judann Dagnoli

PHOENIX, Ariz.—The Association of National Advertisers' 82nd annual meeting was marked by a note of desperation.

The record number of 450 attendees last week seemed to be defending, rather than extolling, the benefits of brand building through advertising. And while most major advertisers gave a public vote of confidence to ad spending, in private few said they will be able to put their money where their mouth is in 1992.

ANA MEETING

"If you listen to the prophets of doom around us, and if you pay them any heed—and I do listen and I do pay them heed—it's not too far-fetched to believe that if I am ever asked again to speak to the ANA, it will be to the Association of Non-Advertisers," said Jim Jordan, chairman of Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York, and a guest speaker.

Even one of advertising's biggest cheerleaders, ANA President DeWitt Helm Jr., said he's concerned companies are losing sight of advertising's importance.

"The problems we are facing [are] public contempt for business, less than perfect confidence in advertising's mes-

Ogilvy at 80

Grand old adman holds forth on compensation, mergers

By Judann Dagnoli

PHOENIX, Ariz.—David Ogilvy is tired.

He's 80 years old and has traveled here from his home in France to spend two days at the annual Association of National Advertisers meeting.

He's just delivered his speech, "We Sell. Or Else," to a who's who of corporate advertising's elite—company presidents, ceos and high-level marketing executives—and has received a standing ovation.

In the past 48 hours, he's had difficulty negotiating the hotel's hallways but not just because his gait has slowed with age. It's also because of the vast number of well-wishers and admirers who approach him, clamoring for a handshake and a chat with advertising's greatest living legend.

So, Mr. Ogilvy has retired to his room and, still dressed in a rumpled navy blazer and trademark red suspenders, reclines on the bed. He lights a cigar and shares some confessions of an adman in his twilight years.

"The reason I'm here is, this man [L. Ross Love, VP-advertising at Procter & Gamble Co. and the new ANA chairman] saw something I'd written about my slogan, 'We sell, or else,' " he says.

"Ross, who I never met and honestly never heard of, wrote

Ad picture brightens for TV nets

By Joe Mandese

In the strongest sign yet that the TV networks are recovering from the recession, prices for most network programs are close to or above the rates paid by advertisers in the 1991-92 upfront marketplace last summer.

Although the fourth-quarter marketplace got off to a weak start, with prices for most dayparts selling for less than those paid in the upfront, market conditions have improved significantly during the latter half of the quarter.

In prime time, for example, the average cost per thousand has risen 16% since the start of the fourth quarter to $7.40, just 5% below the $7.79 average paid by advertisers during upfront, according to the Oct. 31 Netcosts report by media consultant Ephron, Papazian & Ephron.

In daytime, prices currently are 15% higher than those paid by upfront buyers.

"Much as I would hate to predict a turnaround in the network marketplace, that's what the trends indicate is happening," said Doug Seay, senior VP-director of national broadcast at Hal Riney & Partners, New York.

As a result, Mr. Seay said, he's recommending his clients commit to long-term scatter budgets they'd been sitting on to avoid a sudden rise in network prices.

"It's been 18 months of an unbelievably opportunistic market that has lulled a lot of people into a false sense of

States turn marketers sour on green pitches

By Alice Z. Cuneo

National marketers, faced with a plethora of state labeling rules and consumer resistance to premium pricing, have begun to wonder whether the green movement will deliver green at the cash register.

New conflicting state laws may result in marketers pulling environmental claims off packaging or altering them repeatedly at great expense, Melinda Sweet, Lever Bros. director of environmental affairs, said at Advertising Age's Green Marketing West Conference in San Francisco last week.

California's new green statute requires products labeled "recyclable" to be "conveniently" recyclable in counties with populations of more than 300,000. But Ms. Sweet said her staff, after 18 calls to California state officials, was unable to determine how many and which counties had populations exceeding 300,000.

GREEN MARKETING WEST

Rhode Island has banned the 20-year-old "chasing arrow" symbol on packages; New York is establishing a 75-day application process to use the symbol.

"Some marketers are shrugging in the face of this confusion and are in the process of removing environmental information from their packages completely," Ms. Sweet said.

Church & Dwight has decided to change the green label on boxes of Arm & Hammer baking soda to comply with new state statutes at a cost of "hundreds of thousands of dollars," said Robert Viney, VP-marketing. The company has packaged Arm & Hammer in a recyclable cardboard container for 80 years and added the green label about three years ago.

Mr. Viney is concerned about having to change the label again if a new state gets involved. If that happens, "I'm taking the recycling label off until the dust settles," he said.

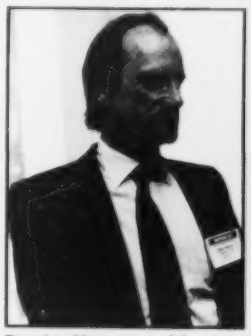
Meeting the wishes of every state and environmental group would require "a wonderful little pamphlet attached to every can of green beans explaining the entire packaging and solid waste problem in the United States and how we can participate in solving that crisis," said conference speaker Jacqueline A. Bogard, director of environmental programs at Del Monte Foods.

Uniform government regulations through the Federal Trade Commission and Food & Drug Administration are years away, said Hubert H. Humphrey III, Minnesota attorney general.

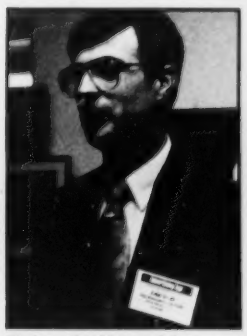
"Since the first Ad Age conference in January, there has been a fair amount of sound and fury on the regulatory front, but so far it's been more commotion than motion," said Mr. Humphrey, who's working with state attorneys generals to develop uniform green labeling.

The federal government is concerned its rules might inadvertently set minimum standards for recyclability or favor one material or disposal method over another, said Michael Dershowitz, senior attorney with the FTC's Division of Advertising Practices.

Michael Dershowitz, Melinda Sweet and Hubert Humphrey III give the audience an update on green marketing regulations.



Denis Hayes said consumers don't trust green claims.



Zeke Swift said some green products sell but it's hard to make a profit.

Also giving marketers cold feet are recent studies showing consumers are balking at paying higher prices for green products, Ms. Sweet said.

"Consumers think they should pay less because they are buying something with used materials," she said. That's why Lever scrapped its bag-in-a-box package for Wisk and Snuggle, which it was testing in Washington and Minnesota, she said.

Procter & Gamble Co. has found that 40% of all Downy fabric softener sales are now for its refill box, said Zeke Swift, manager-environmental marketing. But it's produced only a "modest profit improvement."

One reason consumers may not be buying green products, said Denis Hayes, president-ceo of Green Seal, is that they don't believe manufacturers' claims.

"It's reasonable for people to be saying one thing [about supporting the environment] and not buying the products of [marketers] whose claims they don't believe," said Mr. Hayes, who shared the podium with Stanley Rhodes, president of Green Cross Certification Co. □

L.A. Gear looks for new image

By Marcy Magiera

A struggling L.A. Gear, under the direction of new President Mark Goldston, is revamping its marketing from top to bottom, including an agency review.

Mr. Goldston's goal, sources say, is to contemporize the dated blondes-on-the-beach image created for L.A. Gear by former Exec VP Sandy Saemann, and draw clear identities for its fashion and performance lines.

L.A. Gear wants its new game plan—including new advertising, a streamlined product mix and a new logo—in place before it meets with retailers at the National Sporting Goods Association Super Show in February.

"Everything's [being done] from scratch," confirmed Michael Albright, L.A. Gear's creative director and head of the company's in-house agency. All of his department's projects, from new ads to store hangtags, have been halted, he said.

"The entire company is going to contemporize itself," he said, though he declined to elaborate.

Sources say L.A. Gear executives plan to use Los Angeles' diversity for the new image.

Mr. Goldston, formerly senior VP-chief marketing officer at rival Reebok International, saw a creative presentation from the house agency last week, a Los Angeles agency source said. Though sources say he liked what he saw, Mr. Goldston reportedly is under pressure from Trefoil Capital Investors, L.A. Gear's largest shareholder, to hire an outside agency.

Mr. Goldston wasn't available to comment last week.

L.A. Gear may contact agencies as early as this week about the review. Topping the list, sources say, is Dailey & Associates, Los Angeles.

Dailey founder Peter Dailey is said to be close friends with Trefoil President Stanley Gold, who's reportedly dictating Dailey's inclusion in the review.

L.A. Gear's 1992 media budget is $25 million to $30 million, sources say, down from a high of $50 million two years ago.

Market share for the first six months of 1991 slipped to 8.9% from 11.8% in the same period a year earlier, reports newsletter Sporting Goods Intelligence. For the nine months ended Aug. 31, L.A. Gear's sales fell 25% to $537.5 million. □

Radio's making strides

I was somewhat disappointed in your special section on radio (AA, Sept. 9). Although it is true radio is looked upon by most agencies as a "secondary medium," the article did little to point out what strides radio has made in marketing itself and in developing business.

Stations such as mine in Minneapolis are considered niche-marketing stations, and with the help of Scarborough Research are able to target not only demographically but psychographically into specific audiences that "broad" electronic media cannot. This fragmentation is, I believe, somewhat a bonus for radio and for buyers who are willing to take the time to use this to their advantage. Radio is also on the leading edge of value-added sales and cross-media promotion.

Jeffrey Litt

In "New technology brings radio to cutting edge," Research VP Jerry Boehme at Katz Radio is quoted as saying, "The only reason AM has died compared with FM is a sound quality issue."

The real reasons for AM's decline are poor coverage area and the increased numbers of stations in a market.

When AM was "king," there were two-thirds to three-quarters the number of stations now in most major markets. Even though the size of the audience has increased, increased competition has reduced the size of each station's slice of revenue pie.

When AM was "king," the coverage patterns of AM stations were designed so that most of the population in an area could receive the stations at home, as well as in their cars. As the suburbs expanded past the original coverage areas of many AM stations, they lost listeners. Typically there are one or two AM stations per major market with regional or clear channel frequency assignments that allow them to be heard well outside of their local cities of license. In most cases, the success (or survival) of these AM stations proves my point that "sound quality" is not the major issue.

Why rap G&J success?

I was taken aback by the lukewarm-to-chilly review Gruner & Jahr received in your Oct. 6 special issue, "Magazines in America." If selling on rate card, creating and marketing profitable magazines and launching new publications mean that we rely too strongly on Group Publisher John Hahn, then so be it. I'm curious, though, why Ad Age seems to consider our record with John to be a strike against us.

Your reporter's comment that we have been "criticized for being slow to act and for shopping for, but rarely buying, magazines" is especially bewildering to me, since it seems that our careful research and our refusal to buy at inflated prices have preserved our margins, prevented the headaches that many of our competitors are enduring and left us debt-free, strong and profitable.

It also strikes me that our "Family Plan" is not just the "closest" we have come to corporate sales, but is, in fact, an effective, targeted and coherent corporate sales strategy. It would have been heartwarming if Ad Age had mentioned that we have redesigned BabyCare and Expecting, or that we have—instead of buying overpriced properties—launched our trio of Spanish-language magazines, the Ser Padres network, with great circulation and advertising success. The flagship of this network, Ser Padres, is now the largest Hispanic women's magazine in the U.S., and the country's second-largest Spanish-language magazine of any sort.

Direct mail pays its way

Stanley Cohen's article "The dangers of today's media revolution" (Forum, AA, Sept. 30) provided an insightful analysis of the many changes on the media horizon. However, he is incorrect when he claims that "mail advertising depends on its ability to 'hitchhike' on a postal system funded by someone else."

According to Postmaster General Anthony Frank, direct mail pays its full share through the postal system. In fact, because mailers perform much of the sorting work, the postal service makes a clear profit delivering advertising mail. In fact, without direct mail, the cost of a first-class stamp would be even higher.

Reprise the singing cows

In re: Nabisco's Move Over Butter test (AA, Oct. 14): Almost 20 years ago, Land O' Lakes margarine had cows telling competitors to ". . . m-o-o-ve over!"

Today, Land O' Lakes continues to be a major factor in the spread field—butter, margarine and combinations thereof. Evidently, judging from the Nabisco Foods news, "move over"—delivered by "spokescows"—has caught on.

'Atlantic' ads at sea

I am writing in regards to The Atlantic magazine's most recent promotion campaign (as usually seen in Ad Age on the inside front cover).

It seems The Atlantic is hell-bent on ruining what I think is a great reputation as an articulate, newsworthy and literate magazine with dull, wordy and inconsistent advertising copy like . . . "When the oldest continuously published monthly magazine in America turns Hot people in the ad community want to know why." I kept saying: turns HOT people?

Then there was this mouthful: "For now is a time when what you know matters as much as what you have." This kind of unchecked copy, along with an inconsistent theme, turned me off to their message.

And if that wasn't enough, they then switched gears from copy-heavy to copy-light: "If you wanted to start a magazine perfectly suited to the '90s, what would it look like?" And that was it. Just two cover shots—one informative, one conceptual. Well, which is it?

I think both ideas—with fresh copy—could (and should) have been combined to make one really creative ad campaign.

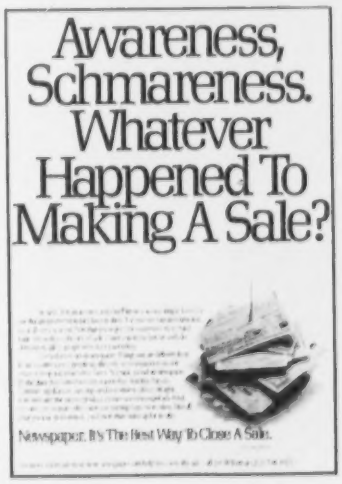
Mean-spirited effort

If this ad is any indication, these must be desperate times for newspapers. They're hurting so badly for ad dollars, they feel the only place they can get them is from awareness advertising budgets.

This ad portrays awareness advertising as some black hole that sucks up dollars with no payoff. And the implication is that advertisers and ad agencies must be saps for believing in it.

I hate to be the one to break the news to the Newspaper Advertising Bureau, but no matter how flip or cynical they want to be about awareness advertising, there's a need for it.

Awareness and brand advertising is why, when a shoe store runs a "sale making" ad in a newspaper, the shoes with the Nike logo sell better than the ones with the ShoeMaster logo.



This ad is just one of a series of mean-spirited efforts by the bureau that attempts to sell newspaper advertising at the expense of TV, radio and just about any other form of advertising they can think of to trash.

Maybe the newspaper bureau should wake up and realize that approaches like this are an insult to the very industry they're trying to feed off of.

At least now, after reading this ad, I know where newspapers stand on the subject of awareness advertising. So the next time we're considering a full-page newspaper campaign for a hospital or utility (or some other client that doesn't need to "sell" something) . . . or when we're considering a double-truck corporate ad in The Wall Street Journal . . . I'll remember that the newspaper folks said awareness ads don't work.

But of course they can continue to count on me for those "sale making" ads.

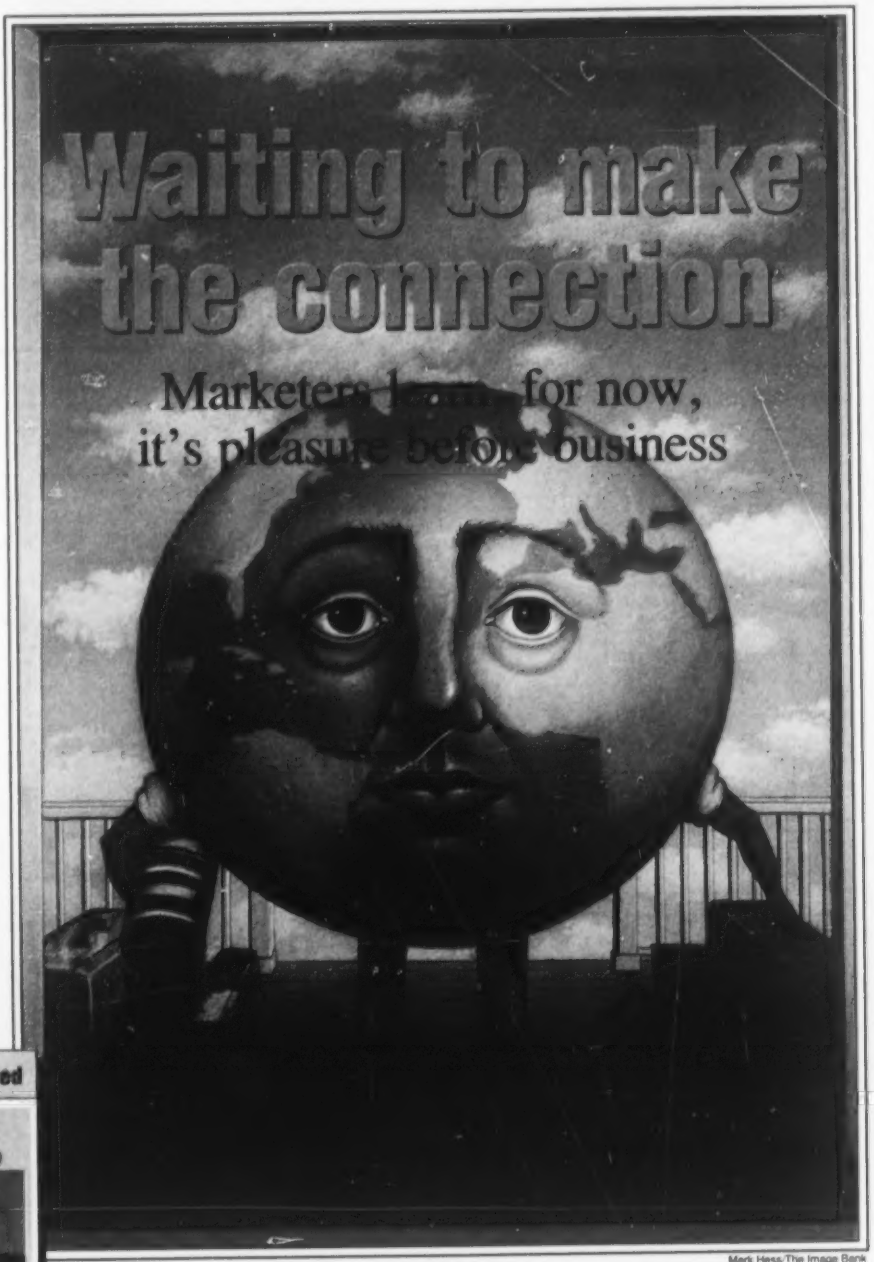
Marketers l... for now, it's pleasure before business



Mark Hess/The Image Bank

By Therese Kauchak

The vista for the travel industry is less than scenic.

Marred by economic woes that left consumers with shrinking amounts of discretionary income during the spring and summer vacation seasons, travel marketers had hoped to see an upswing by fall.

While the travel market has shown some signs of recovery, a rebound is not materializing, says James Cammisa Jr., travel industry analyst and publisher of Travel Industry Indicators, a monthly industry newsletter.

In addition to changes the economy has wrought on consumers' travel habits, shifting demographics are painting a new portrait of the 1990 pleasure traveler.

The decade "began with the greatest trauma since World War II. Consumer confidence dropped to an all-time low," says John Boatright, chairman of the Association of Travel Marketing Executives and senior VP of the Martin Agency, Richmond, Va. "People in the [travel] business say it's the worst they've ever seen."

Pleasure travel has fared better than business travel, says Scott Dring, media relations manager for the U.S. Travel Data Center, but is still below normal.

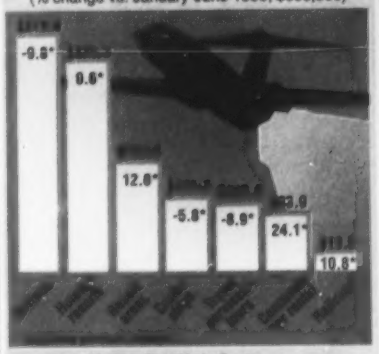
"Business travel dropped 8% from 1989 to 1990," he says. "Pleasure travel increased about 1% [in that same period]." Pleasure travel was down about 1% for the first quarter of 1991, he says.

Before 1990, the volume of travel increased about 2% to 3% annually, Mr. Dring says.

It's possible the industry could rebound to those levels in the 1990s, but "it's really in the hands of the economy," he says.

Airline budgets are less well traveled

Ad spending by travel-related service classifications, January-June 1991
(% change vs. January-June 1990; $000,000)



Source: LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service
Advertising Age graph: Kimberly Mart

In the first quarter of 1991, advertising in the travel and hotel category—encompassing railroads, cruises, airlines, car rentals, miscellaneous passenger travel, tour and travel services, hotels and resorts—was $1.22 billion, down 1.3% compared with the first half of 1990, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

"I think we'll see a marginal growth in ad spending in 1992," says Richard Milenthal, president of Family Vacation Services, a direct marketer of travel information formed by ad agency Hameroff/Milenthal/Spence, Columbus, Ohio.

He expects ad spending from car rental companies will rise slightly, as will resort and travel destination spending. Amtrak and airline spending will hold at this level for 1992, he predicts.

"Pocketbook issues" are the most immediate affecting travel marketers, industry sources say. While vacation costs are increasing, according to the Travel Industry Indicators, the amount of money consumers have to spend is not. U.S. travel prices are up 1.6% over 1990, while consumer disposable income is down 0.2% for the same period.

Higher meal costs and gasoline prices account for most of that increase, Mr. Cammisa says. "Hotel prices and airline fares are essentially unchanged over last year. . . . We'll probably see some modest increases in 1992—2% to 3%—as hotels and airlines try to make up for increases they were unable to make this year, and because [their] operating costs are increasing," he says.

Cost constraints have brought increases in shorter-duration, shorter-distance travel, a pattern analysts expect to continue in the coming decade.

In 1985, the average length of a vacation was 5.7 nights; by 1990, it dropped to 4.1 nights, according to the Data Center. In 1986, the average round-trip distance for a pleasure vacation was 970 miles; by 1990 that dropped to 839 miles. The most recent Data Center statistics show weekend travel increased 28% from 1984 to 1990.

"The majority of travel is going to [continue] to be over the weekend," Mr. Dring says.

Increases in shorter-duration travel have affected state travel bureaus' marketing plans.

"State travel budgets have increased 5% over the previous year," Mr. Dring says. "The major reason is people are staying closer to home and within their [own or nearby] states. Each state is now promoting [itself more].

"People are still going to major tourist attractions . . . but the major increases we are seeing are in the state or within border states," he says.

While the industry has been negatively influenced by economic factors, Mr. Cammisa says, "the recession may have masked some underlying fundamental changes that are beginning to emerge in the 1990s."

The primary pleasure travelers in the '80s were 25-to-34-year-olds and young families with children who traveled by car to closer destinations. In the '90s, Mr. Cammisa says travel marketers will need to reorient their efforts to older consumers.

The aging of baby boomers will benefit the travel industry, because the discretionary income of 45-to-54-year-olds is 15% higher than the U.S. average, Mr. Cammisa says. It will likely bring increases in air travel and in more remote-destination trips.

Time constraints will continue to play a role in consumers' travel choices. That means good news for all-inclusive package vacations and for cruise lines, travel marketers say.

"Time is becoming more important than money," Mr. Boatright says. "Travel marketers who can simplify the process will succeed."

In addition, people want to pack everything they can into a vacation, "and that has made destination and complete resort facilities that are entertainment-oriented [popular]," Mr. Cammisa says.

"Among the big winners in the U.S. for 1991 and beyond," he says, "are Walt Disney World, Las Vegas and cruise ships."

The cruise industry sees resort hotels, including Walt Disney World, as their prime competitors, says Robert Dickinson, senior VP-marketing and sales, Carnival Cruise Line, and chairman of Cruise Line International Association.

In recent years, much of cruise marketing, especially print advertising, has focused on discounting because of increased cruise capacity. But Mr. Dickinson believes that will change.

"The fact that we've had to absorb all this capacity has made us talk [in our advertising] . . . about discounting and deals," he says. While cruise lines have used image advertising on television for market expansion, he believes there is a second expansion opportunity in print.

In print ads, "the industry has relegated desirability [of cruise travel] to second place. I think that will change. . . . If you are a non-cruiser and see an ad for 25% off a cruise, it doesn't mean anything to you. You have to understand what cruise travel is all about first."

Young families and older-generation Americans will keep packing up the family car for vacations. Summer vacation travel by automobile increased 10.7% from 1987 to 1990, Mr. Dring says. He predicts it will hit 13% in 1991 and continue to increase in the '90s. While young families tend to drive for economic reasons and stay with family, over-50 travelers will head for pricier destinations.

Marketers "should not snub their noses at the potential for the very well-financed road traveler," Mr. Milenthal says. "Road travel will be high. I'd watch for the Carolinas, the Barrier Islands [to be popular]. Places that once you get there you are going to spend money. But you'll take a car to get there."

Continuing popularity for road travel is a positive for highway-based hotels and motels, he adds. "It's very good news for hotels that cross U.S. leisure destinations, and also for road-oriented hotels."

The shift in travel patterns "paves the way for the need to get more targeted [in travel marketing]," Mr. Boatright says.

"It's traditionally been done on a demographic basis, but more marketers are finding that's not enough. Now they are using more lifestyle segmentation. After all, people who live next door to each other and make the same amount of money may have completely different ideas of what makes a good vacation," Mr. Boatright says.

"There is a real movement away from mass advertising toward targeted advertising that produces leads," Mr. Milenthal says.

"I think if we are smart, we can have a decent year in the advertising business on the travel side," he adds. "I know I'm going against the flow, but I think we are going to have a decent travel year in 1992.

"It won't be like the mid-'80s, but people consider it their right to travel." □

Losses mount as hotel chains eagerly await '93

By Christy Fisher

The hotel industry won't check out of its current slump before mid-1993. Until then, most hoteliers will spend nights tossing and turning.

The nation's lodging industry is expected to post its 10th consecutive year of losses in 1991, according to the Bureau of Economic Analysis. More than 60% of hotels will post a net loss in 1991 as occupancies continue to fall and room rates fail to keep pace with inflation.

Overall hotel occupancy rates are expected to check in at 61.3% for the year, down 1.4% from the previous year, according to Smith Travel Research. This is well below the industry's break-even level of 65% and off considerably from a high of 70% in 1979.

No signs of recovery are in sight until at least 1993, analysts say.

An oversupply of rooms continues to drag down the overleveraged industry. The recessionary downturn has only made matters worse, as business and leisure travelers cut back on travel, trade down on accommodations or eliminate hotel stays altogether.

"The recovery will be driven not so much by coming out of the recession, but by not building any new rooms," says Bjorn Hanson, national hospitality partner with accountancy Coopers & Lybrand.

"Next year is expected to be what 1991 would have been without the war; 1993 will be the year we'll have a recovery."

"Occupancy rates might rebound . . . by early 1992," says Mark Lomanno, research director at Smith Travel Research. "But the industry will not be profitable again until the mid-1990s."

Industry followers agree that until demand catches up with the oversupply of rooms, the travel market will be highly price sensitive.

All five hotel segments—luxury, upscale, basic, upper economy and moderate economy—reported declines in occupancy for the first eight months of 1991, according to Smith.

Economy hotels, however, are faring better than their pricier counterparts, which saw larger drops in occupancies. Hotel chains using value positionings, such as Choice Hotels International, Embassy Suites, Hampton Inns and Motel 6 Corp., are faring best and will continue to do so.

Top-of-the-line luxury hotels also will continue to post high occupancies without drastic discounting, say industry sources.

However, upscale chains, such as Hilton Hotels Corp., Hyatt Hotels Corp., Marriott Corp. and ITT Sheraton Corp. have been hardest hit, resorting to drastic discounting to fill rooms.

That scenario will change little before the mid-1990s. Each segment will fare about the same in 1992, Mr. Lomanno says.

"I personally think there has been a fundamental shift in consumers' travel attitudes," he says. "In the '80s, travelers looked for bigger, better, glitzier hotels. In the '90s, they will look for value and how they spend time in hotels."

"People have come to the realization that when you stay at a hotel, you get a bed, bathroom, telephone or TV and you can pay $35 for it or $250," Mr. Hanson says. "In the past, it would be embarrassing to say, 'I'm staying at an economy motel,' especially for business travel. But with the proliferation of quality brands, these hotels are no embarrassment."

The battle for market share has led to wide swings in ad spending. Overall spending is up just 0.6% to $336.3 million for the first six months of the year, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

Companies that have seen double-digit percentage increases in first half spending vs. the same period last year include Best Western International, Clarion Hotels, Comfort Inns, Colony Resort Hotels, Embassy Suites, Holiday Inn Worldwide, Motel 6 Corp., Radisson Hotels International, Red Roof Inns and TraveLodge.

Spending was flat at Marriott Corp. and Hyatt Corp. Chains with double-digit cuts include EconoLodge, Friendship Inns, Hampton Inns, Hilton Hotels Corp., Hotel Sofitel, Howard Johnson Motor Lodges, ITT Sheraton Corp., Quality Inn, Ramada Hotels, Rodeway Inns and Trump Hotels.

Price advertising dominates the industry, which also will make heavy use of family and home themes in ads. However, not all hotel chains have resorted to discounting.

Newspaper ads from Stouffer Resorts are headlined "Announcing the perfect vacations for those who believe in family values." Wyse Advertising, Cleveland, is the agency. Holiday Inn Worldwide broke an extensive image effort themed "Stay with someone you know" from Young & Rubicam, New York.

Also, Howard Johnson has set out to update its image with a new, contemporary campaign themed "When the sun goes down, America turns to orange" from Lintas:New York.

Embassy Suites has been touting value with its "Twice the hotel" campaign from Tracy-Locke, Dallas. Choice Hotels International, franchiser of Clarion, Comfort Inns, EconoLodge, Friendship Inns, Rodeway Inns, Quality Inns and Sleep Inns, has been touting coupon books with $1,000 in discounts on attractions, restaurants and rental cars rather than discounting its rooms. Gray Kirk/VanSant, Baltimore, is the agency.

Choice Hotels' sales teams also have been aggressively positioning themselves against upscale hotels and courting Fortune 500 companies with special low corporate rates.

"We're stealing market share," says Bob Gilbert, VP-worldwide sales for Choice Hotels. "Our midprice and budget hotels are gaining from this. We're seeing new customers."

Luxury hotels will continue to cater to the affluent. Upscale hotels, most often located in city business centers, will primarily court business travelers. Budget hotels will attract those most interested in saving a buck, and upper-end economy hotels will cater to business travelers and families on a budget that are looking for some extra amenities.

"I believe we have seen a permanent change in people's hotel purchasing patterns," Mr. Hanson says. "People are choosing their hotels based on what is most appropriate for use." □

Foes slam door on Marriott plan

Prepaid reservations win over 250,000 though others steer clear

By Eric Weissenstein

Pay now, sleep later, says Marriott Corp. But other hoteliers say they don't buy it.

Advance purchase, nonrefundable rates, which have met with varying degrees of success in the airline and rental car industries, have checked into hotels and motels.

In May, Marriott began a summer promotion offering non-refundable, discounted room rates at Marriott hotels, resorts and suites for travelers paying in advance. It has now made the promotion a permanent price fixture.

During the 10 weeks the plan was offered, rates were cut between 20% and 50% for reservations made 14 days in advance, and up to 70% for a 21-day advance purchase.

According to Marriott, the experiment went well. The company sold 250,000 advance purchase, non-refundable room nights, more than twice as many as expected.

Now about 90% of Marriott hotels, resorts and suites are participating, typically offering discounts of 30% to 40%. Marriott also is testing different advance reservation windows.

"This is the third phase," says Gordon Lambourne, Marriott director of national public relations. "We've done it during a holiday period and during the summer. Now we're going into a traditionally commercial period. We will watch it through the end of the year and re-evaluate it at that time."

The Marriott program does not seem to be catching on throughout the industry, however.

"We feel there is very little value added by this type of price structure," says Marc Yanofsky, senior VP-marketing at Hyatt Hotels Corp. "For one thing, it makes things harder for the customer during a period when we should be making it easier. It takes away from the convenience of the product."

Critics warn that, by lowering its price and adding restrictions, Marriott is resigning itself to fighting in the price arena, where it cannot win.

Marriott "must be careful that they don't reposition themselves in a way they do not want, as in a discount segment," says Chekitan Dev, professor of marketing at Cornell University School of Hotel Management.

"We feel the hotel product is not a commodity, so we don't feel pricing strategies that work for an airline seat are applicable," says Chris Baum, senior VP-marketing communications at Hilton Hotels Corp. "We don't intend to follow."

Hilton will continue its corporate identity advertising and will stress service and amenities in its campaigns, he adds.

Another drawback to the advance-purchase, non-refundable plan is that the restrictions "make it more difficult for travel agents," Mr. Yanofsky says. "We think there may be a backlash as there has been to some extent in the airline industry."

With advance-purchase, non-refundable airline discounts, "some travel agents are afraid the customer will go direct to the supplier. They are afraid they will be left out," says Brad Burris, exec VP-consulting services division, Runzheimer International, a travel consultancy. "But I don't think that is going to happen [with hotels]. The travel agent should be able to have all the information on rates in their system. Travel agents aren't as much in the loop with hotels, anyway."

While no other hotel chain has a program similar to Marriott's, the idea of managing a hotel's room inventory by using advance reservation discounts is not new.

ITT Sheraton Corp. is currently running an "Endless Summer" program, which offers discounts of up to 50% Thursday through Friday but which requires an advance reservation. The program runs through yearend.

According to Evanthea Vlahakis, Sheraton's manager-press information, the company looked at Marriott's plan but decided Sheraton "didn't think the customer should have to pay in advance."

> "It makes things harder . . . during a period when we should be making it easier."

To some hotel marketers, it comes down to whether such vast discounts are a wise move in a slumped travel market.

"We've looked at it, and Radisson's point of view right now is that we don't want to market our discount rooms that way," says Geof Rochester, Radisson Hotels International's VP-marketing.

Radisson does offer some discounts, but "we just don't have the relative strength to do [advance-purchase discounts] right now. The customer holds all the cards," he says.

Yet a half-price customer may be better than no customer at all, analysts say.

"I think this is going to be something we see more of," Mr. Dev says. "Hotels are beginning to realize that there is a certain cost to having a room and, if that cost is $20 and you can sell a room for $50, you at least cover some of your fixed costs."

"If a room isn't used tonight, it's lost forever, like an [empty] airline seat," Mr. Burris says. "Right now, the hotel industry is in such doldrums that anything to get people in rooms is going to be tried. The ultimate success will be determined if companies find that hotel rates across the board are lower."

But some travelers have found they get the best rate "by walking in at the last minute, at 8 in the evening," he says. "The kiss of death will be if . . . the traveler with the advance rate finds out he paid more than the last-minute traveler." □

Data base opening doors

Subscribers plug in to hotel, car rental system

By Jennifer Lawrence

A new computer reservations system will enhance marketing opportunities for hotel chains and car rental companies when it comes on-line in June 1992.

Confirm Reservations System will provide greater global distribution capabilities for hotels and car rental companies.

At the same time, Confirm will enable subscribers to create detailed data-base programs on consumer profiles and their preferences.

The sophisticated $125 million centralized reservations system is a joint venture of AMR Information Services, an affiliate of American Airlines; Hilton Hotels Corp.; Marriott Corp.; and Budget Rent a Car Corp. The consortium is called Intrico, or International Reservations and Information Consortium.

Confirm will be used by more than just the Intrico partners; the company plans to sell the service to other hotels and car rental agencies.

"Confirm will bring the hotel and travel industry into the 21st century," says Intrico President Gordon Stevenson of his company's service.

"The only part of this I don't understand is why it took the hotel and rental car companies so long to do it," says Ron Woestemeyer, president of Seabrook Marketing, a travel industry software and strategic consultancy.

"If applied properly, [Confirm] will help subscribers gain increased loyalty from customers and prospects, but it will unlikely impact the old hotel axiom that says the only three things that matter are location, location, location," he says.

"Most business travelers pick hotels based on proximity to where they are doing business," he adds. "And that won't change."

"Hotel and car rental companies have lagged behind airlines in the power of technology and the power of tracking customers," Mr. Stevenson says.

For travel agents, Confirm will increase accessibility to hotel and car rental reservations systems, Mr. Stevenson says.

He claims the system will provide agents with more detailed information about availability and rates on a worldwide basis through airline computer reservation systems, rather than forcing agents to contact various hotels and car rental outfits directly by phone.

"The way things stand now, travel agents cannot access totally reliable information on hotel availability, rates or confirmations," Mr. Stevenson says. "They continue to make reservations by telephone, which is a waste of time, money and effort."

Perhaps most importantly from a marketing perspective, more information than ever before will be readily accessible through a data base.

Existing systems handle reservations and typically only keep files on frequent users or visitors. Confirm closes the loop by feeding information back into a data base—whether the guest actually stayed at the hotel, how long he or she stayed, how much money was spent and demographic profile data.

"Companies will get to know more about their customers through the massive data base we haven't had in the past," Mr. Stevenson says.

He believes that tracking detailed information will enable companies to practice "proactive" marketing by using geographic promotions or offering special rates in certain areas or increasing ad spending in key areas.

By creating an extensive data base on customer profiles and preferences, hotel and car rental companies are able to identify specific consumer patterns of individuals and corporations.

If a car rental company sees that IBM Corp. has a heavy pick-up schedule in Syracuse, N.Y., and a corresponding drop-off in Buffalo, N.Y., for example, it could approach IBM and create a special rate for them based on the heavy usage.

> "Companies will get to know more about customers through the data base we haven't had in the past."

Brand loyalty can be improved as the reservation agent, relying on the consumer's past record, says, "You used a car phone in Biloxi. Would you like one here in Chicago?" The scope of consumer information enables the reservation agent to provide consistent and personalized service, says Janice Schroer, Intrico director of communications.

"Basically, Confirm will do for hotels what centralized reservation systems have done for the airline industry," says Michael Ribero, senior VP-marketing at Hilton Hotels Corp.

"We will get to know our customers better. We'll know their travel patterns. We'll be able to narrow in on media. Guest histories will tell us what [customers] like. We'll be able to do more targeted marketing," he says.

Mr. Ribero believes by 1993 Hilton will begin to implement marketing programs based on data from the Confirm reservations system. He expects an increase in direct marketing efforts with a much more tailored approach.

Intrico already has begun to market Confirm to prospective subscribers. Print ads are running in travel trade publications. Gleason & Associates, Dallas, handles.

One of the first ads read, "When it comes to designing the most advanced reservations systems in the world, great minds think alike."

Another print ad shows a photo of a luxurious but empty hotel room. The copy says, "With an outstanding reservations system, this room would be occupied."

Mr. Stevenson says he is encouraged by the industry's response so far both in the U.S. and in Europe. He says prospective customers have signed letters of intent to subscribe to the Confirm system, declining to reveal any names.

"Hotels and car rental companies now are able to see the marketing power of Confirm and why it gives them a competitive edge," Mr. Stevenson says. "While we're focusing on car rental and hotel firms, the program has the flexibility to handle other travel-related businesses like cruise line and ticket sales." □

Trade ads promote Confirm as an information management system and reservation service that can help hotels fill their rooms and put drivers in rental cars.

Car renters take leisurely ride

Business travel shortfall brings out weekend deals, convertibles

By Ira Teinowitz

Rental car companies are facing the brave new world of recession-era travel with a push for leisure travelers.

As business travel continues to fall short, renters are making advertising more friendly, less business-oriented. They also are altering pricing and practices to make them more appropriate to leisure travelers. Hertz Corp. and Avis Rent A Car System are among companies that have tailored new creative to the changing marketplace.

Some car-rental marketers that haven't changed their creative are making other moves, which include adding rental sites at shopping centers or department stores. Renters' push for leisure travelers was underway even before the recession.

In its "Because it's your money" ads, Thrifty pushes weekend rentals for customers with particular needs such as convertibles.

Business travel in recent years has been flat or down as the recession pushes companies to cut costs.

"Business travel suffers more [than leisure travel] when the economy is hurting," says Scott Dring, media relations manager for the U.S. Travel Data Center.

While Auto Rental News reports that rental-car industry revenues rose to $7.9 billion last year, up 16.1% from 1989, much of the growth has been in the leisure segment.

This year's recession and the problems of the Persian Gulf War haven't helped.

Airlines Reporting Corp., which tracks travel agency airline and car rental sales, says revenues were down 6% through August. Several renters say business travel has been flat or down as much as 7% depending on location.

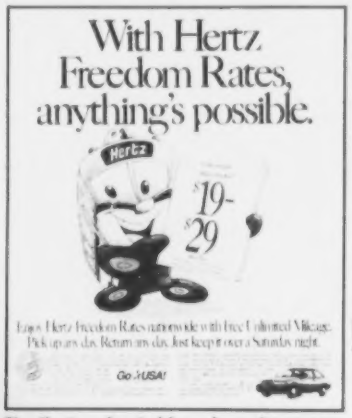
As of July 1, there were 1.4 million rental cars in service, up from about 1.2 million last year, according to Auto Rental News.

"We have developed a strategy for the '90s that is based on leisure travel growing faster than business," says Brian Kennedy, Hertz exec VP-marketing and sales.

Hertz three years ago abandoned its traditional business orientation and a campaign featuring O.J. Simpson, Jamie Lee Curtis and Arnold Palmer for one less business-oriented.

The move to be more leisure-oriented sped up with the recession.

Hertz earlier this year broke advertising for Florida travel that featured an animated bus character, then took the bus national. Wells Rich Greene BDDP, New York, handles the account.



The Hertz animated bus character was designed to make the car-rental company more appealing to the leisure customer.

"We wanted to make Hertz more appealing for the leisure customer, to overcome Hertz's business image," says Mr. Kennedy. "We wanted to make Hertz approachable."

Hertz won't discuss specific breakdowns of spending, but says it has raised spending for leisure products while keeping business spending static.

Avis Rent A Car System has adopted a dual approach for pitching the business and leisure renter. The company also is making its new TV spots less business-oriented.

Avis' main campaign pitching the importance of the company's employee-ownership to renters will be continued this fall, but it will have new creative using everyday renters instead of the business owners used last year. The old campaign used business owners talking about the reasons they rented from Avis' employee owners.

Avis also is targeting emerging markets ranging from senior citizens to women.

While both campaigns mention rates, business ads note speed of service and leisure-oriented campaigns pitch dependability. Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, handles Avis.

"We want to make sure we are getting our pro rata share from emerging growth segments," says Allen Kurzman, VP-marketing services.

Budget Rent a Car Corp. started the year expecting a recession, so it had planned to push leisure efforts.

"As we entered the year, we knew there would be increasing pressure as people go for a share of a smaller pie," says David Sparks, Budget's VP-advertising. "We knew that leisure would be where the big battle was fought." Leisure was expected to be hurt less than business travel, and to be a bigger growth area for the future.

Budget simplified its pricing schedule for leisure renters and installed remote transaction booths allowing car rental from Sears stores even when no operator is present. Tracy-Locke, Dallas, handles.

Some traditional off-airport renters also took some new looks at the leisure market.

Chrysler Corp.'s Thrifty Rent-A-Car System is directing some of its advertising at people who don't fly but have special weekend travel needs. A campaign pushed rental of minivans and convertibles.

"Our forecast at the end of last year [was that] there would be less international travel and more U.S. travel," says Steve Grosvald, senior VP-marketing. "We decided we didn't want to just focus on people who fly, but on the increasing number of people who rent cars to take regular vacations."

Thrifty's normal fall campaign pushes business vehicles, but this year the company is using hockey star Wayne Gretzky in a campaign much broader than in the past. The theme line remains "Because it's your money." Ciociola & Co., New York, and Ad Inc., Tulsa, Okla., handle Thrifty.

While most of the rental companies are targeting leisure travelers, at least one leisure renter is reversing the trend.

Alamo Rent-A-Car, traditionally the leading off-airport renter, is using recession-borne business cost concerns to push corporate rentals. Alamo is now on-airport at more than 40 locations.

Alamo's ads from Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, included promoting Cadillac rentals on the West Coast.

"While Hertz and Avis were going after the leisure market, we saw an opportunity to go after the business market," says Donald Moonjian, VP-marketing. □

Amtrak moves on from basic training

By Christy Fisher

Boosted ad budget and narrower buys seek to hold onto gains

The recession has derailed much of the travel industry, but Amtrak keeps rolling along.

The U.S. Travel Data Center estimates that only 1% of American vacationers traveled by train this summer. Despite the small percentage, Amtrak estimates it will experience a 4% to 5% gain in revenues for the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, to about $1.37 billion, says Robert Gall, VP-passenger marketing and sales. Passenger loads increased less than 1% to about 22 million in the same period. That figure does not include contract commuter passengers.

The numbers, however, are still up—something much of the vacation travel industry won't be able to report.

"Amtrak did pretty good for the year. They experienced a strong first quarter when air travel was off as a reaction to the Gulf War," says industry analyst James Cammisa.

"Growth has slowed down a bit, but it's still growth in an industry that is having difficulty," he says. "Their performance relative to the rest of the travel industry is pretty good."

Amtrak, which courts both business and leisure travelers in advertising, has been able to negotiate the economic downturn by pushing competitive pricing and the advantages of rail travel over other transportation modes such as car travel and the airline shuttles. Although "All aboard Amtrak" continues as the advertising theme, from agency DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, the pitch is being modified as improvements are made to service.

Amtrak spent $31.6 million in spot TV, cable, radio, newspapers, magazines and outdoor in fiscal 1991—up 10.5% from the previous year, according to Amtrak.

The largest increase came in newspaper and magazine ad spending, up 125% and 89%, respectively. Newspaper ads are price- and schedule-oriented, while image ads are used in magazines. The shift in newspapers reflects new services added in Chicago and along the East and West Coasts, Mr. Gall says.

In fiscal 1991, Amtrak shifted media for cost-efficiencies, giving higher weights to fewer markets. Instead of 33 markets, it concentrated in 16, which generate about 75% of all revenue, he says.

"Advertising spending for fiscal 1992 might be the same as last year, or up by 3%," Mr. Gall says.

Leisure travelers make up about 70% of Amtrak's riders. Business travel is showing signs of strengthening, with Amtrak's Metroliner service coming on stronger than in the past, Mr. Gall says. But the advertising mix in 1992 will be the same as in 1991, with the bulk of the target on leisure travelers.

TV spots for long-distance train travel compete with airlines by highlighting close-up views of wildlife of the Southwest and the Pacific Northwest—sights riders would miss in an airplane.

Other spots show slice-of-life scenes on a train. One features an older couple enjoying dinner, a movie, socializing and sleeping on the Auto Train to Florida, which also carries their car. Another focuses on the experience train travel offers young families.

A TV spot for shorter-distance leisure travel highlights Amtrak's extensive U.S. network connecting "big towns and little towns, hometowns and downtowns" and its competitive fares.

All spots for the price-sensitive leisure market are tagged with price promotions that show Amtrak is competitive with airline travel.

"We do not try to undercut air fares," Mr. Gall says. "We offer a good price, but not necessarily the lowest."

Amtrak has no extraordinary price promotions planned for fiscal '92. But if the travel market is not stronger by Thanksgiving, Mr. Gall says he expects to see a lot of travel promotions next year.

"If there is a downturn, there will be more promotions. Our plan assumes that things will improve slowly, but at a steady rate. If that does not happen, there could be more price promotions or a shift in media to one product or [another]."

For the business market, Amtrak pushes its Metroliner train service, offering frequent trips in heavily traveled business corridors, such as New York-Washington and Los Angeles-San Diego.

Metroliner offers advance-purchase seating and positions itself directly against shuttle airlines. For example, a print ad is headlined "The most productive business traveler never leaves work up in the air" and lists amenities that help executives get their work done: tables and conference rooms, telephone service, computer hookups and a first-class lounge with food, beverage service and business periodicals. A Metroliner spot is aired during sports events in the Capital Center in Andover, Md., and New York's Madison Square Garden. Magazine and outdoor also support.

Amtrak also is developing contract commuter services in markets where state or local authorities have agreed to subsidize operations, such as Boston, Baltimore-Washington and Orange County-Los Angeles. A TV spot for commuter services shows contrasting scenes of frustrated drivers stuck in highway traffic while relaxed commuters breeze by on Amtrak.

Rising fuel prices and air fares, increased congestion on highways and at airports, a decline in passenger bus service and environmental concerns bode well for train travel, industry observers say.

Also, high-speed trains, which are being discussed in Texas, Florida, Nevada and the New York-Boston corridor, could significantly boost ridership. Amtrak would be interested in participating in the services, but they could be privately operated.

"There could be a explosion in train travel if there are high-speed trains," Mr. Gall says. "But that requires an awful lot of money."

Mr. Cammisa says that's the main roadblock when it comes to Amtrak's future growth: It's limited by funding constraints.

Amtrak continues to fight a battle year after year to get subsidies from the federal government. High-speed trains will likely depend on the support of federal or state funds, and as long as the U.S. remains a car-oriented society, highway funding will receive priority, he says. □

Figures are for six months ending Sept. 30, 1991, compared with same six-month period last year, except where noted. Where papers reported separate numbers for higher-selling papers on one day, daily figures are weighted averages. In some cases Sunday papers have different names.

Circulation reparation

'Daily News' bounces back from strike; rivals up

By Ira Teinowitz

The New York Daily News' circulation has rebounded from strike levels but remains more than 30% below pre-strike levels, while other New York papers held onto some circulation gained at the Daily News' expense.

The Audit Bureau of Circulations' latest report shows circulation problems for newspapers in other cities, aggravated by local marketing changes and price hikes spurred by the recession. By comparison, some newspapers that made no changes—including USA Today and both Denver dailies—reported circulation gains.

The audit bureau's FAS-FAX report compares circulation for six months ending Sept. 30 with the same period last year.

It's the first major report for the Daily News since a strike ended March 12 and the paper was subsequently sold to English publishing baron Robert Maxwell.

The Daily News reported circulation fell 30.6% to 762,078. (Estimates placed the paper's circulation well below 500,000 during the five-month strike.) Sunday circulation was reported at 911,684, down 34.9%.

That's below the Daily News' guarantees of 800,000 daily and 1 million Sunday circulation. The guarantees, announced by Mr. Maxwell after he assumed control of the paper, were intended to bolster advertiser confidence until the paper's first post-strike audit.

An advertiser rebate plan will be in place this week, said Les Goodstein, VP-advertising director. The paper met its guarantees for September, he said.

"Looking back last March, when we made the decision to go with a rate guarantee, we kind of looked with a crystal ball and came up with 800,000 and 1 million on Sunday," Mr. Goodstein said. "It was very optimistic."

The guarantee was a vital step to bolstering the Daily News at a time when people didn't feel the paper had a chance of regaining its pre-strike vitality, said Don Nizen, VP-circulation. He said the paper has rebuilt confidence enough to start carrying News America Publishing's free standing insert packages in January.

While rivals saw some circulation slippage after the labor dispute was settled, all three are up from last year. The New York Post reported daily circulation rose 8.2% to 552,227; still, that's down 14.3% since March. The New York Times also said circulation rose 0.6% to 1,114,830 daily and 0.8% to 1,700,825 on Sunday, though the paper was down 8.5% daily and 3.6% Sunday from March. While Newsday reported daily circulation rose 7% to 763,972 daily and 22.7% to 875,239 Sunday, it also was down 4.1% daily and 8.9% Sunday from March.

The audit bureau's FAS-FAX report contained no breakdown of Newsday's New York and Long Island circulations, but the paper said the bulk of the gains were in New York. The paper reported Long Island circulation grew 0.5% to 494,961 daily and 2.7% to 575,917 on Sunday, while New York Newsday grew 21.4% to 269,011 daily and 97.4% to 269,011 on Sunday.

Also reporting daily circulation declines was The Wall Street Journal, down 3.3% to 1,795,448. The Journal raised its newsstand price 50% to 75¢ on Dec. 3.

Other major dailies with circulation declines included the Detroit Free Press, The Detroit News, Milwaukee Journal and St. Louis Post-Dispatch, which doubled its newsstand price to 50¢ on April 15.

In Philadelphia, circulation declines for both papers are attributed to the Philadelphia Daily News' March 4 switch to morning from evening publication, pitting it against The Philadelphia Inquirer. Both are owned by Knight-Ridder. The Daily News also raised its single-copy price 43% to 50¢. The Los Angeles Times attributed its 1.6% decline in daily circulation to efforts to drop unprofitable circulation in central California and Nevada. Sunday circulation rose 0.8% to 1,529,609, due in part to cable guides tailored to individual cable systems; the paper has offered discounted Sunday subscriptions in the areas where it distributes the cable guides.

Among papers reporting daily circulation increases were The Washington Post, The Dallas Morning News, Chicago Sun-Times and Chicago Tribune. □

COVER STORY

By Janice Kelly

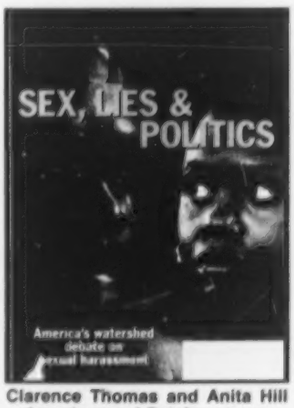
Cover Story is a monthly ranking of celebrities' popularity as reflected by their appearances on the covers of more than 30 of the nation's leading publications.

MEDIA WORKS

Anita Hill and Clarence Thomas together topped Cover Story for October with the nation riveted to the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings.

The unlikely couple earned 12 points on the index, which assigns point values to cover appearances based on such factors as the publications' frequency and the prominence of the photos.

The month's main attraction was in Washington, but the balance of cover editors' attention was focused on Hollywood. Michelle Pfeiffer took second place with 8.5 points with publicity surrounding her role in the movie "Frankie & Johnny."



Clarence Thomas and Anita Hill shared several October covers.

Third place with 8 points went to actor Keanu Reeves, who stars in the film "My Own Private Idaho" and was named one of US' "sexiest stars."

Jodie Foster placed fourth with 7 points as cover editors spotlighted her directorial debut with "Little Man Tate." She's already a strong November Cover Story contender, with several appearances on November issues.

Fifth place is a 6-point tie between comedian Redd Foxx, who died following a heart attack on the set of CBS' "Royal Family," and Elizabeth Taylor, who celebrated her eighth wedding. Groom Larry Fortensky tied several celebrities for eighth place with 4 points.

Seventh place went to La Toya Jackson, who earned 5 points with her second Playboy pictorial and coverage of her book "Growing Up in the Jackson Family."

Rounding out the survey with 4 points each were Cher, Patrick Swayze, Delta Burke, Roseanne Arnold, Pee-wee Herman, the "Dynasty" cast and Katey Segal. □

Turner takes time with samples. Turner Broadcasting System, Atlanta, has postponed its ad-supported cooperative direct mail program, a company source said. The quarterly "Turner Sample Pack" was to launch this month (AA, Aug. 12) but has been delayed to third quarter 1992, the source said. The source said advertisers were interested, but 1991 promotional dollars were locked up when Turner introduced the program in August.

Whittle tunes in to Russia. Channel One, Whittle Communications' ad-supported TV medium in schools, and Pepsi-Cola Co. on Nov. 26 will link students at a Moscow school with students at Centerville, Ohio, High School, for a live discussion about the meaning of freedom. Pepsi is sole sponsor of the one-hour show.

Art title unveiled. Rizzoli International Publications, New York, this month launches XXIst Century, an upscale art and culture magazine distributed through bookstores and select newsstands in the U.S., Canada, Europe, Australia and Japan. The three-times-yearly will cost $7.50; initial worldwide circulation is 30,000. Each issue will carry a single corporate sponsor; Philip Morris International is the first.

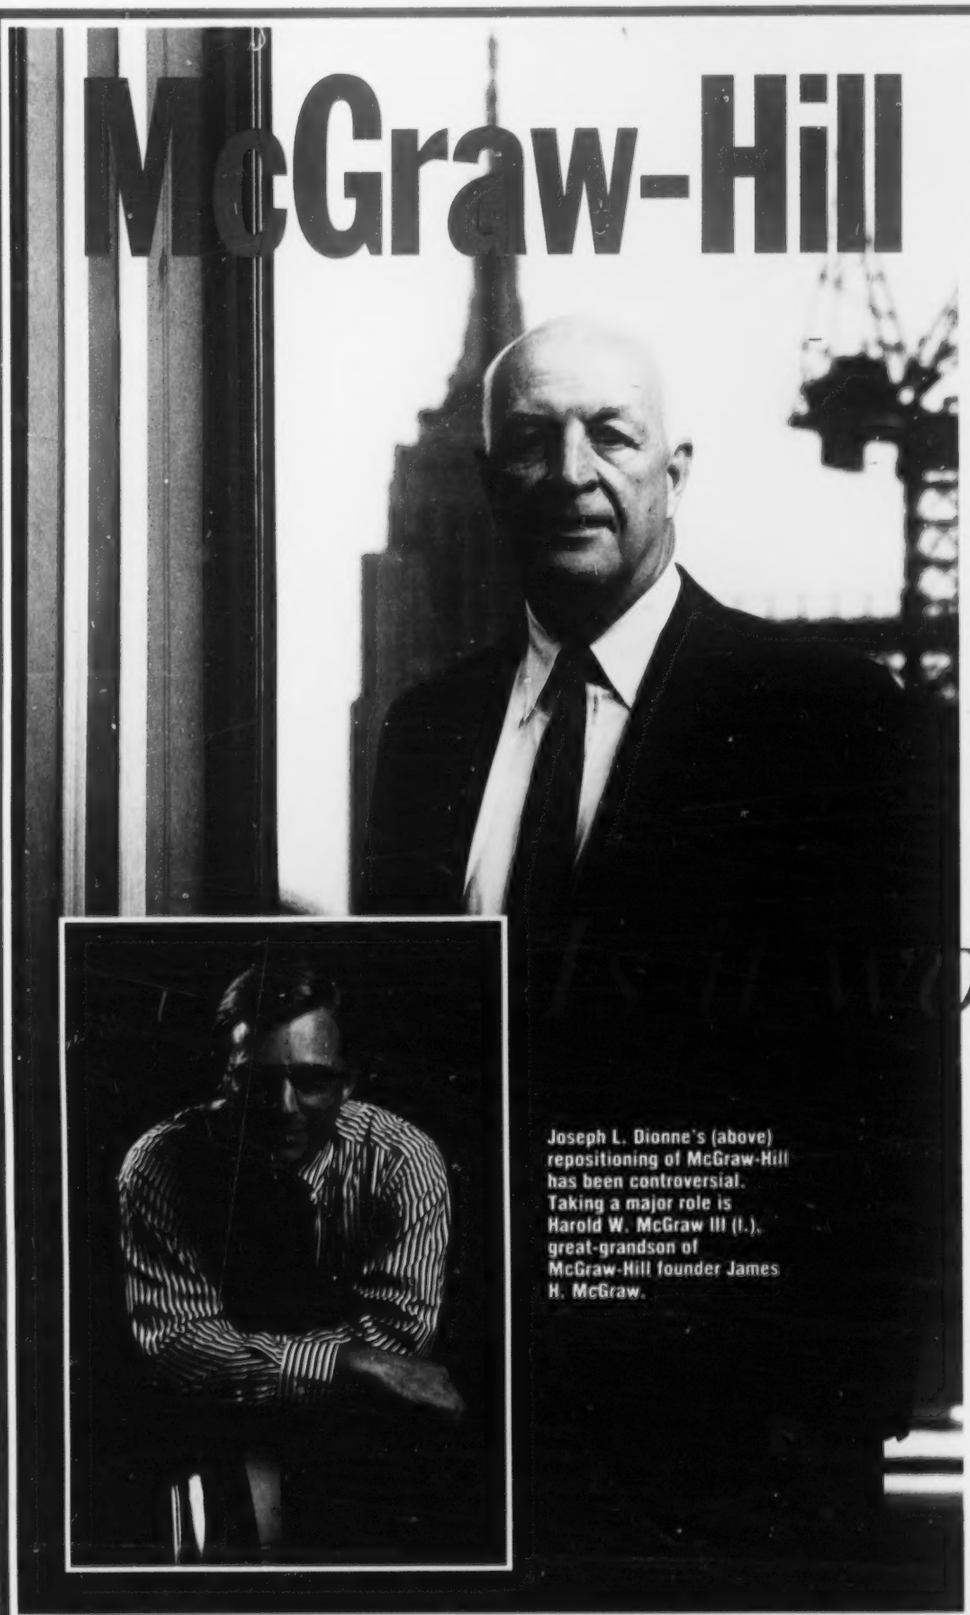
McGraw-Hill today



Joseph L. Dionne's (above) repositioning of McGraw-Hill has been controversial. Taking a major role is Harold W. McGraw III (l.), great-grandson of McGraw-Hill founder James H. McGraw.

...working?

By Joseph M. Winski

There was much jubilance at McGraw-Hill headquarters on March 1, 1979.

American Express Co. had let its $1 billion acquisition offer expire. McGraw-Hill, which had fiercely resisted the takeover bid, would remain independent and under effective control of the McGraw family.

But there was also an undercurrent of anxiety, particularly among longtime executives of the company's magazine business.

Just the day before, Harold W. McGraw Jr., chairman-ceo, had named Joseph L. Dionne to the post of exec VP-operations, the second-highest position in the company.

Insiders then knew it was only a matter of time before Mr. Dionne became the next McGraw-Hill chief executive—only the second non-McGraw to run the company in its then 91-year history.

The choice of the former Long Island schoolteacher was neither expected nor widely popular. If history meant anything, the pick would have been Gordon Jones, the gregarious president of

Riney responds to harassment suit

SAN FRANCISCO—Hal Riney, his agency and three current or former employees are countersuing a former staffer who filed a sexual harassment suit. Their slander suit, filed in San Francisco Superior Court and seeking unspecified monetary damages, charges that Debby Ann LeBeau and her attorney, John S. Spencer, maliciously released information to the media during the Thomas-Hill hearings in an attempt to "coerce payment of money" from Hal Riney & Partners. The cross-complaint also denies Ms. LeBeau's charges that Riney Senior VP-Director of Creative Services Carol Lee Kelliher was "procuring for her superiors." Ms. LeBeau, terminated in January, was a secretary in the creative department. The countersuit also says Ms. LeBeau has acknowledged former copywriter Jim Papademas, one of those named in her suit, "never attempted to touch her." Ms. LeBeau has said the third person named, copywriter Paul Mimiago, played over the office intercom a recording she had made, but the countersuit says Riney's offices don't have such intercoms. Mr. Spencer said he couldn't comment on the countersuit on the advice of his attorney. Riney's

Mennen up for sale; Japan's Kao in lead

By Pat Sloan

Mennen Co., a 113-year-old, family-owned marketer of such familiar toiletries brands as Speed Stick and Skin Bracer, is up for sale.

The sale will include Mennen's core toiletries business as well as its paper party-goods subsidiaries, Paper Art and C.A. Reed, said Leonard Sichel, vice chairman-chief financial officer.

"The [Mennen] family made this decision just recently," Mr. Sichel said, adding that a sale could be negotiated by yearend.

Japan's Kao Corp., through its Kao Corp. of America and Andrew Jergens Co. units, has emerged as the most likely buyer, industry sources say. Other potential buyers include Gillette Co., Colgate-Palmolive Co., Unilever, Procter & Gamble Co., L'Oreal and Henkel Group.

An internal memo distributed to employees at a Mennen unit indicated growing competition in the toiletries market prompted the planned sale.

"You are no doubt aware that in today's marketplace, we face competition whose funds, manpower and facilities are many times greater than those of Mennen and its subsidiaries," the memo said.

"This fact of life will become even more critical going forward. As part of a larger organization, Mennen, Paper Art and C.A. Reed will have the resources they need to compete successfully," the memo continued.

Mennen's investment bank, believed to be Goldman Sachs, last week began sending out books on the company to interested buyers.

Mennen is a multinational company with consolidated sales estimated between $500 million and $600 million, and international distribution, including Mexico, Central America, Venezuela, Canada, France and Italy.

The core toiletries business generates more than $300 million in sales, sources say, with the balance of sales by Paper Art and C.A. Reed.

Industry consultant Allan Mottus speculated that two primary factors are motivating the sale.

"In part, it's a generational thing," Mr. Mottus said. "No

Maxwell aftershock:

Owner's death clouds future of 'Daily News,' 'European'

AP/Wide World Photos

Kevin Maxwell, 32 (l.), and his brother Ian, 35, faced the media outside the headquarters of Mirror Group Newspapers in London last week.

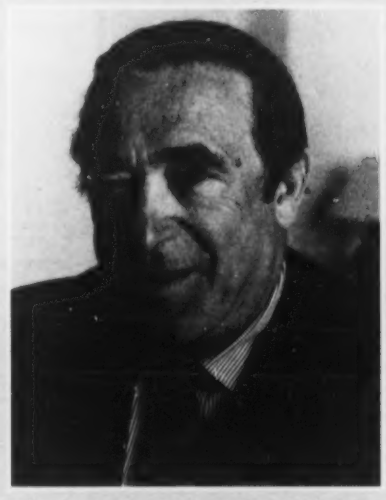
By Scott Donaton and Laurel Wentz

The media properties left most vulnerable by the death of Robert Maxwell may well have been the ones he loved most: New York's Daily News and The European.

Industry analysts are most concerned about the future of those two properties, uniquely dependent on the flamboyant personality, passion and charisma of Mr. Maxwell. The global media baron was found dead last week in the waters off the Canary Islands after disappearing from his 180-foot yacht during a vacation trip.

Preliminary autopsy results indicated Mr. Maxwell died of a heart attack before apparently falling from the boat.

In the days following his death, observers questioned how long Mr. Maxwell's sons, Kevin and Ian, would continue to endure losses at the Daily News and European as the two face an acute financial crunch.



Following Robert Maxwell's death, his sons were put in charge.

To dissuade that line of thinking, Kevin Maxwell was on the phone last week assuring advertisers of his commitment to the Daily News, much like his father has done in the past.

Despite a spate of asset sales in recent months, expected to continue, Mr. Max-

AmEx talks to Time Warner

Deal would include nat'l magazines; city book shopped

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—American Express Co. is discussing the sale of a significant stake in its two national magazines to Time Warner.

As part of its continuing search for a partner or buyer for its publishing properties, AmEx is also seeking an outright buyer for NewYork Woman and there's speculation the company may try to sell its three other city magazines.

The flurry of activity follows the recent collapse of talks between AmEx and K-III Holdings, which was negotiating to buy a majority stake in AmEx's magazine group.

Time Warner is talking to AmEx about a joint venture that would involve only the highly profitable flagship Travel & Leisure and Food & Wine, said a source close to the discussions.

AmEx and Time Warner officials declined comment.

Time Warner isn't interested in the city magazines because they're believed to be losing money.

But "the city books are definitely for sale. [AmEx] wants out of the city books," the source close to the talks said.

AmEx wants to keep a stake in the national magazines, which are closely tied to its charge card business, and is reluctant to allow potential buyers access to its database, used to automatically renew subscriptions.

K-III sources say talks with AmEx collapsed because K-III feared Travel & Leisure was too dependent on automatic renewals and its profitability and value would plunge if it was ever separated from the database.

AmEx's city magazines include NewYork Woman, L.A. Style, Atlanta and D. NewYork Woman is known to be on the selling block and there are rumors the magazine will be folded if a buyer isn't found.

Fred Drasner, president-ceo of U.S. News & World Report and The Atlantic, said he had a preliminary meeting with NewYork Woman Editor Betsy Carter and a representative of investment banker Wasserstein Perella & Co. about buying the magazine.

"They just came in to give me a pitch," he said. "I really don't know the level of our interest since I haven't seen the numbers."

Mr. Drasner said he was waiting to get financial information on the magazine.

"I think they're trying to sell the city magazines," Mr. Drasner said. "They just came in with NewYork Woman but they told me the rest may be available."

HIV revelation tests Magic's ad appeal

An Advertising Age roundup

The bombshell dropped by Earvin "Magic" Johnson has left marketers featuring him in their ads teetering on a fine line.

The advertisers expressed shock and concern after Mr. Johnson announced he was retiring from the Los Angeles Lakers after testing positive for human immunodeficiency virus, the virus that has been linked to AIDS.

Observers agree it's unlikely he will be featured in future commercial campaigns. But public service spots are another matter, since Mr. Johnson has stated he wants to work with AIDS awareness efforts.

"We've received hundreds of phone calls, from small groups to large groups," said Richard Crasnick, director of marketing and public relations at First Team Marketing, which represents Mr. Johnson. ". . . We'll evaluate all the offers and decide what's the best way to go."

Jack Mariucci, exec VP-executive creative director at DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, and a co-chairman of Ads Against AIDS, said Mr. Johnson will be "a fabulous spokesman. . . . If he wants to get his message out, we're here to help."

Elenore Hangley, Advertising Council exec VP, said Mr. Johnson appeals to the young audience the council wants to reach with its AIDS prevention campaign.

The star's visibility had never been brighter for commercial purposes. He ranks behind only sports superstars Bo Jackson and Michael Jordan and Los Angeles Dodgers manager Tommy Lasorda in a 1991 survey of the most persuasive athletes in TV commercials by Video Storyboard Tests.

Dave Vadehra, president of the research company, said marketers tied to Mr. Johnson face a sensitive issue in deciding whether to stick with him in some way.

Magic shot hoops in a 1990 spot for Slice orange drink.

"It's a real tough call for the advertisers because they do certainly have sympathy," he said. "But having sympathy is one thing; having a national spokesman is something different."

None of the marketers with which Mr. Johnson is most active —Pepsi-Cola Co., Converse and Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp.—is currently running commercials that feature him.

One advertiser for which Mr. Johnson just recently inked a deal, Nestle Chocolate & Confection Co., quickly disassociated itself from published comments from its ad agency.

A report in The New York Times quoted John L. Taylor, vice chairman of Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York, as saying he doubted commercials featuring Mr. Johnson and promoting Nestle's Crunch candy bar would air as scheduled in January.

Frank J. Arthofer, president of the Nestle USA subsidiary, released a statement calling the quote "not authorized."

Rebecca Madeira, Pepsi-Cola Co. director of public relations, said: "As far as the future is concerned, Earvin and Pepsi will decide together at a more appropriate time."

Mr. Johnson's multimillion-dollar contract to endorse Pepsi's soft drinks was signed in 1989 and expires next July.

Mr. Johnson's involvement with Converse dates to 1979, and also included a joint venture for a line of athletic shoes and activewear called Magic by Converse. But the line has been phased out, and the last ad featuring him ran in June.

Kentucky Fried Chicken used Mr. Johnson earlier this year in a TV and print campaign.

Dick Detwiler, KFC director of marketing communications, said: "It's too soon . . . to say what impact this news might have on any future business." □

Prodigy 'magazine'?

Computer service seeks circulation audit

By Bradley Johnson

LOS ANGELES—Prodigy Services Co., the ad-supported on-line computer service, wants to be classified as a magazine and have its circulation validated by the Audit Bureau of Circulations, in a move to gain advertiser credibility.

Such a move would make Prodigy the first non-print consumer medium tracked by the audit bureau, a precedent that would position the bureau to provide third-party validation for other interactive electronic media.

"As other advertiser-supported electronic services come to the fore, we would stand ready to work with them to verify the auditable aspects," M. David Keil, audit bureau president-managing director, said in an interview at the bureau's annual convention last week.

"I don't see any major impediments," he said of Prodigy's membership application. The audit bureau's board didn't take action last week, however.

Prodigy, developed jointly by IBM Corp. and Sears, Roebuck & Co., lets consumers use home computers to call up news and stock quotes, and do banking and shopping. Ads are sprinkled throughout the system.

Prodigy wants the audit bureau, the primary third-party auditor of magazine and newspaper circulation, to classify it as a magazine.

"We are a magazine," competing for magazine advertising, "only we don't have paper," said Gabe Samuels, Prodigy's trade marketing manager. "Why continue to kill trees?"

A magazine classification would put Prodigy in terms that media buyers would understand, but there was some discussion within the audit bureau's board that Prodigy should be put in a new classification.

Mr. Keil says the audit bureau is looking at how it could validate Prodigy figures.

Prodigy has auditable records of who its customers are and how, when and for what they use the service. But Mr. Keil noted the audit bureau's standard print definitions—paid circulation, pressruns, postal verifications—wouldn't translate well.

"We would be talking a whole new language," he said.

There is a precedent, however. For about two years, the audit bureau has audited Data Transmission Network, an ad-supported farm "magazine" that delivers information on commodities to farmers through computers.

Many publishers, computer marketers and consumer electronics companies see enormous potential in Prodigy-style electronic services delivered over computers and TVs. As new companies move in and traditional magazines and newspapers branch out into such ad-supported services, Mr. Keil said the audit bureau wants to be there.

"If there is a need for auditable information . . . our board will obviously give it very careful consideration," he said. □

BBDO section a highlight

I really enjoyed the 100th Anniversary commemorative insert (AA, Sept. 30). It was one of the highlights of this milestone event in BBDO's history. And I know our people in New York and around the world were very pleased with the issue as well. Thanks.

I just finished reading the commemorative section on BBDO and wish to congratulate you and your staff on some excellent reading! The historical background provided keen insight into one of the top agencies in our business. The only copy that is equal to this profile is the copy in some of the testimonial ads. The copy is some of the cleverest and most humorous I have read in a long time. Kudos to those writers!

Congratulations on a super BBDO edition. A humorous recollection of an eight-year BBDOer:

As manager of the BBDO softball team, I had a casual conversation with Jim Jordan. He mentioned he had been a member of a BBDO championship team of the past, but that had been his last playing year. Why? His reply: "My boss asked me if I wanted to be the best softball player at BBDO or the best copywriter."

As it happens, I mentioned that Al Rosenshine, then a new copywriter, was on our present squad and was a good hitter and left fielder. Funny, that was Al's last year as a player. I always wondered if Jim, Al's boss, had the same conversation with Al as his boss had years ago.

Giant carpet

Floored by soft porn

Here is an ad we can certainly do without! I wonder why so many sleazy ads come from retail advertising in newspapers. Is it that the subject matter is so dull, they naively try to spice up the ad with a sophomoric, soft-porn headline? This certainly turns me off Giant carpets! Can you believe this ad ran in the good, gray New York Times?

I'd also like to comment about your ad in the Sept. 30 Ad Age, in which you say that "the Soviets asked Advertising Age to organize a seminar to introduce them to the basics of communicating and selling" (emphasis mine). It's that "introduce" that gets me! These Soviets are some con artists.

In 1969, these Soviets invited Young & Rubicam to send some people to Moscow to talk to the folks at Vneshtorgreklama, the U.S.S.R. ad agency, about modern communicating and selling. Alex Brody, then head of Y&R Europe, George Gribbin, then president of Y&R, and I went. We put on a three-hour seminar.

We were invited back the following year to do it again, in expanded form, for a large audience including people from their numerous commercial agencies. This time we were joined by Ed Ney, then head of Y&R International. A year later, we learned that another agency had been invited to do likewise, I think it was BBDO. And then a little later, still another agency, perhaps McCann. And all of us trooped dutifully over, at our own expense, to educate them on modern advertising and sales promotion. I'm amused to see the Soviets are still at it.

Boomers read more

Your article on the outlook for newspaper advertising was pessimistic enough without compounding it with Kenneth Berents' erroneous data (AA, Oct. 14). The Alex. Brown & Sons analyst's numbers just don't meet the test of reason.

He uses an unconventional definition of 24 million baby boomers starting with age 30. That means he's only considering the 30-to-34 age span. Even assuming two readers per copy, Mr. Berent's claim of 500,000 circulation in this age group would produce only a net reach of 4%. In fact, the 1991 syndicated research of the Simmons Market Research Bureau indicates 58.4% readership levels for daily newspapers and 67.7% for Sunday newspapers in the 30-to-34 age bracket.

Make reading a joy

As a public librarian, I was struck by Kenneth Berents' statement: "Of the potential pool of 24 million baby boomers age 30 and older in the 1980s, only 500,000 have become newspaper subscribers. . . . Newspapers have to change to bring in the baby-boom generation" (AA, Oct. 14).

I don't believe that newspapers will ever attract more of the baby boom generation than they have now. From personal observation, I would say that steady newspaper readers, for the most part, are people who love to read. They read newspapers for the joy they get out of reading, as much as for the information presented.

In speaking with frequent library visitors I found that most learned to love reading before they were 13 or so by reading hundreds, if not thousands, of pleasure-giving books, honing their reading skills and making reading a pleasure rather than a chore.

Schools, in my view, cannot teach the "joy of reading" because in their laudable attempt to measure ability they usually couple assigned reading with the pain of tests and book reports.

I find that the only institution working to create and nuture readers is the public library. Industries that depend on people who enjoy reading should see that local libraries are well supported.

It's too late for the reluctant readers of the baby boomer generation. If they didn't learn to enjoy reading as kids, most of them never will.

From the trenches

I was extremely disappointed at your front page article on sexual harrassment (AA, Oct. 21). The women you chose to interview were top executives. Although they are bright and successful women, they are far removed from the activities that go on with those in lower and middle management and clerical positions.

The women you should have interviewed are those still in the "trenches." Those of us who are still struggling to achieve our success in the business world. We are the ones who must put up with the uncalled for sexist comments, attitudes and advances.

Interviewing these women was about as insightful as interviewing male managers. They are not in the position to see the "ugliness" that occurs in the real world.

If you want to know how this is affecting the "average" working woman, ask us. There are a lot of women who are ready to talk about the sexism they have witnessed and received.

Cindy Smartt-Mancini

Asking senior agency and publishing executives whether the advertising business has a sexual harassment problem is like asking Roger Smith whether the American auto industry has a quality problem. The answer is predictable: 'No, not here.'

By proclaiming a problem, they'd be pointing a finger at themselves.

Don't overlook syndication

The Oct. 14 issue of Advertising Age included a timely look at the prospects for several major media, including network cable and spot TV, each with a sidebar from Robert Coen. Unfortunately, something was missing:

- A medium which has been the fastest-growing part of TV for over 5 years, and which is expected to remain so through the 1990s.
- A medium in which the top 100 advertisers spend more money than in cable, according to your own magazine.
- A medium which provides almost as much original programming per week as ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox.
- A medium which companies like Disney, Warner Bros. and Paramount are finding more important as a marketplace than network TV.
- A medium which is competing successfully with the networks for precious time periods, forcing them to reduce their program offerings.

I refer, of course, to advertiser-supported syndication. Too often, I'm afraid, your publication overlooks this important medium (1991 revenues: $1.275 billion), even when conducting an overview of the industry. In your 100 Leading National Advertisers issue, for example, there were special breakouts for top network advertisers and cable advertisers . . . but none for syndication.

Your readers need to be informed about what's going on in syndication, because it is affecting the way viewers watch TV (other publications are ahead of you in this regard). Because syndicators deal with local TV stations as well as national advertisers, they understand the drastic changes which are occuring in television, and are bringing about a revolution in the way stations acquire and present programming.

Marching orders for '90s: Expand computers to peripheral areas, then tie it all together

By Bradley Johnson

At a product briefing last month, Apple Computer Chairman John Sculley explained Apple's future by recalling the film "The Graduate."

"You remember how the guy came over to Dustin Hoffman and put his arm around him and said, 'Plastics,' " Mr. Sculley says. "In the 1990s, it's communications. If I were to put my arm around someone I would say, 'Digital communications.' "

Mr. Sculley's advice refers to the growing use of computer technology in non-computer products, such as consumer electronics and telephones, as well as advances in computers' ability to communicate with each other.

The trouble is that the vision of the future may not compute with today's corporate and home PC buyers, who may have learned how to pick a PC but haven't a clue of how to buy digital communications.

The computer industry, striving to energize slowing sales growth, is staking its future on a spate of potentially confusing new products—including operating systems, multimedia wares and pen-based computers.

This confusion, the recession and the PC's inability to further penetrate the home market are taking a bite out of industry sales.

Marketers have waged price wars over clones of IBM Corp.'s PC. These wars have turned the PC into a commodity and decimated industry profits (see chart on Page S-2). In the third quarter of 1991, Compaq Computer Corp. posted a net loss of $70 million, reportedly playing a role in last month's ouster of Joseph Canion, Compaq's president-ceo.

> "If I were to put my arm around someone in the '90s, I would say, 'Digital communications.' "

Although expanding applications into additional areas may confuse consumers, it appears to be a critical component in re-energizing the computer marketplace.

While sales continue to rise, 1990 advances in PC unit sales and revenues marked the smallest growth for the industry, according to market researcher InfoCorp (see charts on Page S-5).

An economic recovery next year would benefit PC sales. But experts disagree over how much better sales could be in this scenario.

InfoCorp predicts double-digit gains in both revenues and units sold for the U.S. PC market.

Bruce Lupatkin, an analyst with investment company Hambrecht & Quist, offers a dissenting opinion. He agrees the U.S. PC market will be healthier next year but still projects a third consecutive year of single-digit gains in both revenues and the number of PCs sold.

"I'm moderately optimistic," Mr. Lupatkin says, noting the PC market could benefit from expected election-year attempts by the Bush administration to jump start the economy.

Some observers feel the economy's influence on the PC industry may be overstated.

InfoCorp analyst David Carnevale says the recession has had comparatively little effect on PC sales.

"Clearly, our numbers don't show that the numbers declined," he says. "The numbers increased." He attributes InfoCorp's predictions of relatively robust growth to an improving economy and new products such as notebook and pen-based computers.

The recession's most obvious impact has been in market-share shifts, as budget-tight computer buyers have redirected purchases from premium brands like Compaq and IBM to cheaper clones like Dell Computer Corp. and AST Research.

With little differentiation between PC brands and a recession that has customers more concerned about budgets, PC marketers are forced to compete on price. A typical clone with hefty memory, a mouse and a color monitor averages $1,214 now, or 21% less than last year, says Steven Lair, VP at Dataquest, a market research company.

"The real winners have been the end-users," Mr. Lair says.

Despite the recent price wars and introduction of lower-cost products—perhaps best exemplified by Apple's release of its $999 Macintosh Classic—the average wholesale price of a PC has risen from $2,700 in 1987 to about $3,000 now. Buyers are spending about the same amount of money but getting more powerful machines.

In a classic example of how a computer marketer has been affected by price wars, Apple closed its fiscal year, which ended Sept. 27, with a 60% increase in unit sales but only a 14% increase in revenues, to $6.3 billion. As a result, net earnings fell 35% to $309.8 million.

Despite the damage to corporate bottom lines, analysts expect price-cutting to continue. As one indication of this trend, Eckhard Pfeiffer, the new president-ceo of Compaq, has a reputation of being someone who will cut both costs and product prices.

More than recession, a lack of compelling new hardware and software currently is hurting PC sales, Mr. Carnevale says.

standard-issue business computer—dates to 1985. The Apple Macintosh, the primary alternative to the IBM/Intel/MS-DOS world, dates to 1984.

Mac sales are soaring, but that's mainly attributed to the introduction of Apple's low-cost models, not new technology.

But whether the industry could develop a computer that can meet the needs of U.S. offices and homes remains to be seen.

On the home front, in particular, PC marketers simply haven't come up with a compelling reason for consumers to buy unless they need a machine for business or school use.

Although some prognosticators predict the computer eventually will become as ubiquitous as the phone in U.S. homes, the PC is way behind other electronic gadgets in penetrating the home market. The PC is in an estimated one-fourth of the nation's homes, while Nintendo Home Entertainment System, introduced in 1986, is in an estimated one-third of U.S. homes.

Some observers believe multimedia computers, which blend audio and video with the text of current PCs, will help bring the PC into the home. But with a $3,000-plus price tag for a new model and a not-yet-concrete definition of consumers' uses for the technology, multimedia has its share of doubters. (See story on Page S-11.)

As for the office, the PC industry is working on a store of new technology—such as multimedia products and pen-based computers, which use a stylus rather than a keyboard to enter information—that could ignite sales.

The expected variety of products contrasts sharply to the '80s, when the main choice was IBM/Intel/MS-DOS vs. Apple Macintosh.

On the plus side, these choices could help differentiate products and foreshadow the decline of the clone-based PC commodity market.

Despite the strength of industry kingpins in this scenario, "no single computer vendor, be it Microsoft, IBM or Apple, can control the market anymore," Mr. Lupatkin says.

Longtime rivals, most notably IBM and Apple, are uniting to concoct what they hope will become industry standards in such areas as operating systems, multimedia and pen-based computers.

But on the minus side, much of this new technology is between six months and several years away, assuming marketers can even deliver on their promises.

More important, the promise of these additional choices could create confusion among buyers or encourage them to put off purchases while they wait for new products based on advanced technology.

IBM users, for example, don't know whether to listen to IBM's ads for OS/2, an operating system whose much-hyped revision has yet to be introduced, or to comments of IBM executives about the wonders of a planned new IBM/Apple operating system—one that could supersede the current product.

"No single computer vendor, be it Microsoft, IBM or Apple, can control the market anymore."

Some analysts say such decisions are largely irrelevant to home and small-business computer buyers and to large companies simply needing to add PCs.

Most users who can justify the need for a computer today probably will buy, says Nancy McSharry, an analyst at market researcher International Data Corp.

But this need to buy could perpetuate the commoditization of the industry, as buyers make purchases on price and not brand identity. If computer buyers can justify that today's proven PCs can boost their productivity, she says, there will be little holding them back—particularly given the falling price tags.

Explains Mr. Lupatkin: "Sometimes it's the more boring products that are the ones that sell."

Still, he notes, this is an industry that thrives on new products.

"The potential is that for the next five years we could go into a period of much greater innovation, more products and more operating systems," says Stewart Alsop, editor in chief of trade journal InfoWorld. The problem with that, he says, is it's "more of what's perceived as chaos." □

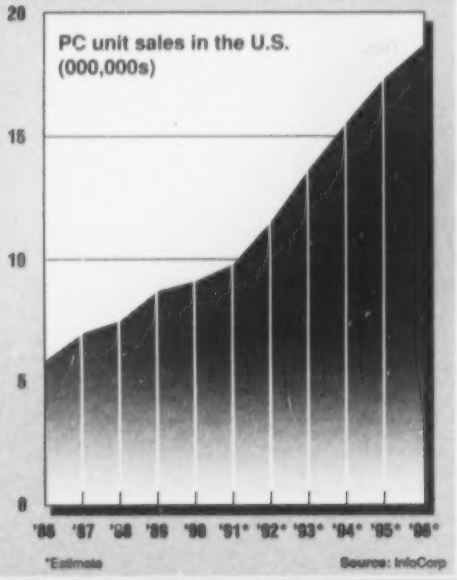
Overseas markets to bolster future PC sales

U.S. PC market loses its power–

Double-digit gains in the number of PCs sold in the U.S. plummeted dramatically from 15.8% in 1989 to 4.7% in 1990 and an expected 8.2% for this year.

Next year's unit sales are expected to improve substantially, up 17.5% over this year.

The double-digit sales bump is expected to last through 1995, when comparatively unhappy days return again with an anticipated 7.9% increase in units sold in 1996.

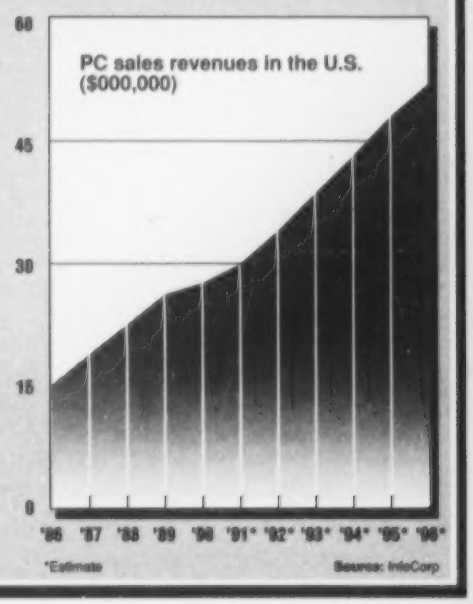


Dollars generated from PC sales in the U.S. predictably have mirrored unit sales.

Last year marked the low point in the industry's growth curve when PC sales revenue advanced only 5.4%, falling from a substantial 16.5% advance in 1989.

This year revenues are expected to increase a more respectable 8.4%, but double-digit growth isn't anticipated to return until 1992's advance of 13.2%.

In 1993, growth is expected to top out at 13.6% before steadily sliding down to 8.9% in 1996.



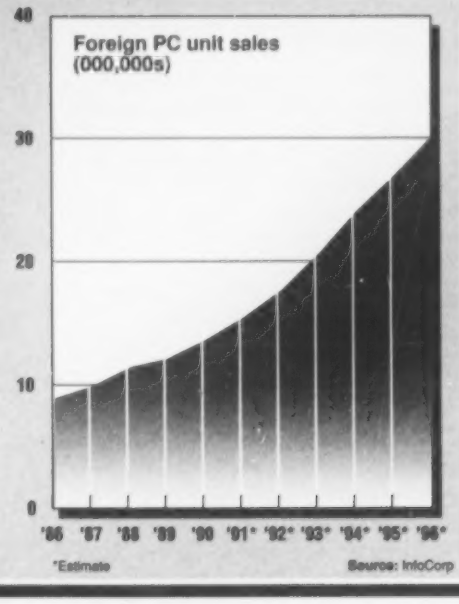
Foreign relief for PC industry

While growth in the U.S. market has slackened, foreign sales of PCs have picked up.

With the exception of 1989's 6.6% growth in foreign unit sales, double-digit jumps have been the rule. In 1990, for example, while U.S. unit sales growth was only 4.7%, foreign unit sales hit 12.3%.

Although U.S. based sales growth is expected to improve next year, it is predicted the growth pace will fall again in the mid-'90s. Foreign sales, however, are expected to grow at double-digit levels through 1996 at least.

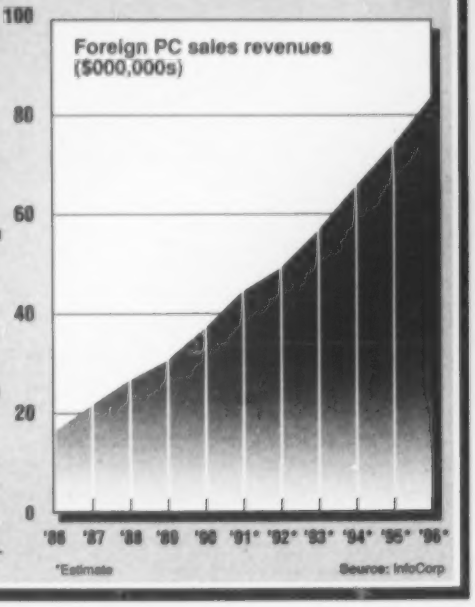
The growth curve is expected to peak in 1993 and 1994, when annual foreign unit sales increases are projected to hit 17.1% and 16.6%, respectively.



While the disparity between U.S. and foreign PC unit sales growth is expected to become more extreme, the gap in revenues generated from U.S. and overseas sales is not as marked.

Revenue growth from foreign sales will not fall into the single digits like revenue growth from U.S. PC sales. But top annual foreign revenue growth will not surpass the 15.7% figure expected in 1994; a far cry from the 21.2% jump in 1990 and this year's anticipated 19.8% rise. In fact, the 13.2% gain in revenues from U.S. sales expected for next year will outpace the 10.6% advance in foreign sales anticipated.

Revenue growth from foreign sales will be more stable over the longterm, however. In 1996, dollar volume increases from U.S. sales will tumble into the single-digits, while foreign sales are expected to advance 13.5%.

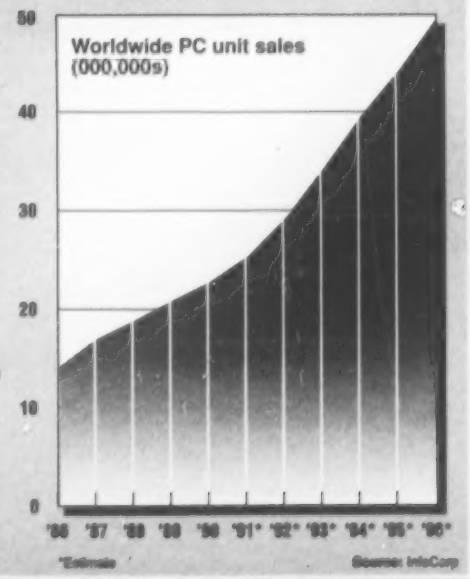


Global picture shows PC market to ram forward

PC marketers' world doesn't look so bleak when viewed globally. The strength in foreign markets has blunted the effects of the softening U.S. market.

Last year tipped the balance of power between the U.S. and foreign markets in terms of PC units sold. U.S. unit sales growth of 15.8% in 1989 helped offset a relatively poor 6.6% advance in foreign sales and generate 10.3% worldwide growth. In 1990, the roles were reversed: A 12.3% gain in foreign unit sales compensated for a soft 4.7% increase in U.S. sales and helped the worldwide market jump 9.1%.

Predicted double-digit annual gains in number of units sold worldwide, peaking at 17.4% in 1993, increasingly will be attributed to foreign market performance in the mid-1990s.



When it comes to ringing the cash register, the worldwide picture looks relatively bright.

Thanks to expectations of marked jumps in foreign revenue, the global PC market's worst performance is expected next year, when revenues will advance 11.6%. Annual dollar growth will resurge to above 14% in 1993 and 1994, before softening to 12.2% in 1995.

The next low point will occur in 1996, when U.S. PC sales revenues will grow only 8.9%. Although foreign revenues are expected to jump 13.5% in 1996, revenue performance from U.S. sales will drive down the worldwide advance to 11.7%.

Stylus-activated computers make their mark

By Alan Radding

After battling for the corporate desktop and fighting to establish a beachhead in the home, computer makers are attacking the customer's briefcase next.

Notebook-size pen-based computers represent the newest computing frontier. Pen-based computers, which can run common PC software like Lotus 1-2-3, use an electronic stylus that writes on a special computer screen. The computer responds to marks made on the screen and translates handwriting into computer-readable text.

Currently Grid Systems Corp., a subsidiary of Tandy Corp., is the market leader with about 20,000 units sold since its inception.

But sales of pen-based computers should jump to 125,000 units next year and reach 1 million units by 1995, according to BIS Strategic Decisions, a market research company. Sales generated by this segment will jump from $90 million this year to $2.8 billion by 1995, BIS adds. Other observers, though, have predicted sales of at least 1 million units within the next 12 months.

Industry observers expect an in-progress $2 million print campaign from Momenta to kick marketing of the industry into high gear.

"Until Momenta's campaign, no one spent money advertising pen-computing," says Bill Lempesis, publisher of the newsletter PenVision.

Momenta and agency Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, are targeting a general computer audience in the current campaign, which includes general business and computer trade publications. The campaign will be expanded to mass consumer media in January, says John Rizzo, Momenta's VP-marketing. Billings for 1992 may reach $8 million to $10 million, he says.

Meanwhile, Grid, which introduced its first pen-based system in 1989, is pitching its PC-compatible computer at vertical markets, says Ken Dulaney, director of marketing-portable computers.

The Grid product replaces clipboards and hand-held devices like bar-code scanners. "We are going for very mission-specific, industrial applications," he explains.

Some industry observers think Grid's marketing strategy may be more sound because the general market may not take an immediate liking to the high-price pen-based computers.

occur before the consumer market emerges, according to observers: More popular PC software must be incorporated into the small devices; new software must be developed to take advantage of pen-based technology; and prices must drop from current levels, which can reach $7,000.

When the price differential between a conventional keyboard-operated notebook computer and a pen-based system is within $500, Mr. Lempesis expects the general market to take off. Currently, the Momenta product, which also features a traditional keyboard for conventional text input, lists at $4,995. The average PC clone, including a mouse and a color monitor, runs about $1,200, according to market research company Dataquest, while notebook models start at about $2,000.

Mr. Dulaney doesn't believe the current general computer market will accept the going price for pen-based systems.

"When the price drops below $1,000, you'll see a horizontal market develop," he predicts.

Once the costs come down, Grid intends to release a new product against the low-end electronic pocket organizers from Japanese consumer electronics companies such as Casio and Sharp Electronics Corp.

"We're interested in going after the consumer market through Radio Shack," Mr. Dulaney says.

Although consumers may balk at the initial prices for pen-based computers, the product apparently is important enough to involve all the major computer manufacturers, Mr. Lempesis says.

At last month's Comdex trade show, six marketers introduced pen-based systems. IBM Corp., although not officially announcing a pen-based product, demonstrated a pen-based product currently in development.

IBM bestowed legitimacy on general pen-based computing last year by allying itself with Go Corp., developer of PenPoint, a computer operating system for pen-based computers. Microsoft Corp., the dominant player in PC operating system software, is promoting its own pen-based operating system software, Windows for Pen Computing.

Meanwhile, the alliance of Apple Computer and Sony Corp. of America may produce a pen-based product. The two already have released a notebook-size, keyboard-run Macintosh, and Sony has created a pen-based computer for the Japanese market. NCR Corp., now part of AT&T Co., began limited shipments in September of its $4,675 NCR System 3125, and several Korean manufacturers also are in the game.

"Eventually Toshiba, Compaq, Dell—all the big names—will have something," Mr. Lempesis predicts.

Marketers of palmtop computers, another computer area that's expected to burgeon, eventually may jump into this market.

"Pens are the next major wave in technology, but it is still probably a year away from consumer acceptance," says Robert Owens, director of marketing communications, Poqet Computer Corp. □

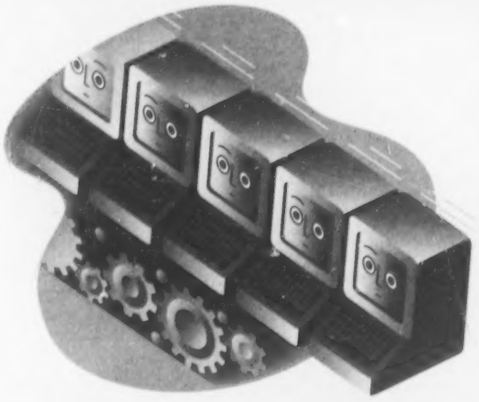
Marketers go color blind



To paraphrase Henry Ford, you can have any color PC you want, as long as it's gray or tan.

Despite the sleek, high-tech images that computer companies try to project, the actual products, with a few notable exceptions, are intentionally bland in appearance.

Some marketers have considered following the lead of radio manufacturers and unveiling PCs in a variety of colors to convey the customer's personality. The thinking is this change, however minor, could help the industry battle the increasing commoditization of the PC.

But computer companies are reluctant to use color for two major reasons: ergonomics and professional appeal.

"In Europe there are very strict workplace standards for ergonomics, and part of those standards call for minimum contrast between the display and the surrounding screen," explains Gary Podwalny, industrial design manager at Hewlett-Packard Co.'s Corvallis division. The result is computers that come in some variation of the gray palette.

There are no such standards in the U.S. But if companies expect to sell their products worldwide without having to adjust their production processes, they voluntarily restrict themselves to a very limited, low-contrast palette, Mr. Podwalny says.

Computers from Next Computer, launched by Apple Computer co-founder Steven Jobs, not only have a futuristic look but come in black—a clear violation of the European ergonomic standards.

"I wonder how Next will do in Europe. They were aware of the issue," Mr. Podwalny says.

Momenta Corp., which recently introduced a pen-based system, hopes to break out of the conventional computer mode with a line of lifestyle cases in a variety of colors and materials, says Paul Braund, president of Braund Creative Design, San Francisco, designer of Momenta's PC shell.

But color is down the road. The initial Momenta machines are, as expected, dark gray.

"The first thing we had to do was to establish an image for the mobile professional. We had to make sure the comfort zone was there," Mr. Braund says.

When Mr. Podwalny designed the HP 95LX handheld computer, he considered a variety of colors. He decided on dark gray not for ergonomic regulations but professionalism.

"We did a lot of research and found that our customers—high-level professionals—expressed some interest in more trendy colors like mauve but then opted for a more professional image," Mr. Podwalny says.

Customers want the handheld computer to look professional, not toylike or trendy.

"Colors are very trendy, going in and out of fashion," he notes.

The computer, Mr. Podwalny adds, has to look like "a tool, not a gadget."

No more cloning around

PC marketers appear ready to go on brand-building binge

By Christy Fisher

Advertising for personal computers is on the verge of another revolution.

Not since the early 1980s has the computer industry seen the creative explosion that marked its early years: IBM Corp.'s Little Tramp, Apple Computer's "1984" spot or Compaq Computer Corp.'s humorous campaign starring actor John Cleese.

Since then, the prevailing theme in PC advertising has shifted from promoting an image to presenting technological breakthroughs to selling on price.

Now, analysts say the profit-ravaged industry is looking to retreat from price wars to its home base: Building the brand image.

Making this strategy shift will be particularly important to clones, which currently have little name identity.

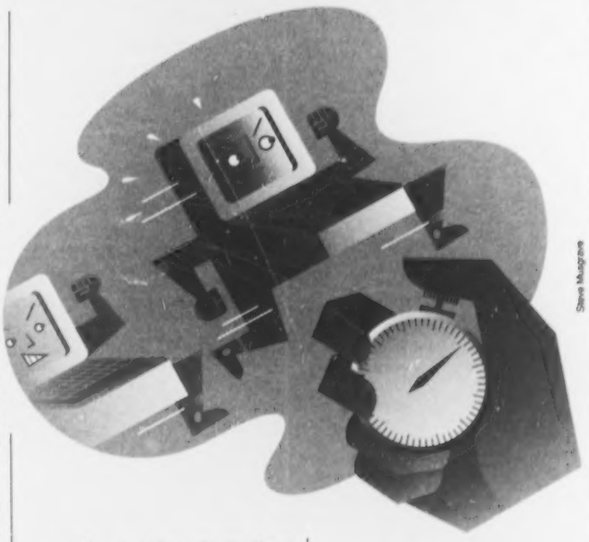
"Now that the PC market is maturing and many products are much the same, computer marketers will have to differentiate their products much the same way Procter & Gamble differentiates its soaps," says Bruce Lupatkin, a computer industry analyst for the investment firm of Hambrecht & Quist.

That bodes well for advertising spending.

"Advertising is going to play a bigger role," says Kevin Bohren, Compaq's VP-corporate communications. "As there are less product and service differences, you will see computer marketers advertise, advertise and advertise.

"Ad spending will be up quite a bit more than the 1980s," he contends.

This shift in marketing focus already has put at least one account in review. Compaq, which has used Ogilvy & Mather, Houston, since the marketer's inception in 1982, is considering several agencies, including the incumbent, for its estimated $20 million to $30 million North American account.



Steve Musgrave

IBM advertising, which has been criticized for being drab and not reflective of Big Blue's leadership, may be headed in new directions for the 1990s.

"There will be another level adopted by us and others of adding value with service and support, and not comparing box to box," says Jim Garrity, IBM's director of U.S. advertising.

"The whole industry is in a flux right now," Mr. Lupatkin says. "All are stepping back and evaluating."

So far this year, marketers of PCs, peripherals and accessories have slowed ad spending.

These marketers have spent $107.7 million in advertising during the first half of the year, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. This figure represents a 3.5% drop from the same period last year.

But marketers' plans for the short-term future appear to include spending increases.

After abstaining from TV advertising this year, Compaq plans to return to TV in 1992 "to try to differentiate itself from the pack," Mr. Bohren says. Building the Compaq brand is one of the company's key goals, he says. Compaq uses a premium positioning themed "It simply works better."

Major players, which have been hard hit by low-priced clones, are expected to emphasize value and affordability, while marketers of clone machines work on name-rec-

The discount superstore is changing computer retailing, just as it did the automotive, building materials, consumer electronics, general merchandise and office supply segments.

Now that PCs are considered more a commodity than a novelty, consumers and corporations are shopping for them much the same way they shop for a TV, CD player or VCR.

Instead of seeking assistance and expert advice from a traditional computer dealer, home and business computer purchasers are looking for bargains from mass merchandisers and computer superstores.

"People are buying computers the same way they buy blenders and toasters," says Douglas Kass, senior analyst for Dataquest, a market researcher. "One product has more or less essentially the same features as another. Price has become more important."

Both business purchasers and home PC users have flocked to these lower-priced outlets, which cut prices but don't offer the service and support of a higher-end outlet.

Computer superstores, such as CompUSA and CompuAdd Corp., by 1995 are expected to sell 20% of all PCs to the corporate market, up from 2% in 1990, according to Dataquest. Mass merchants also will gain share from 6% currently to 15% of unit sales.

The superstores' gains primarily will be made at the expense of traditional computer dealers. These resellers still sell the most PCs, but their share of the market will drop from 47% in 1990 to 33% by 1995, Dataquest says.

Although value-added resellers will post increases, mail order and direct sales also will suffer share declines. Mr. Kass says buyers will seek the "instant gratification" of purchasing a low-price product at a computer superstore or retailer rather than wait for the product to come in the mail.

Similar trends are under way in the home PC market.

Dataquest estimates mass merchants will claim the largest share of computer purchases by 1995, overtaking traditional computer dealers.

This shift in retailing trends is causing computer marketers and retailers to scramble to meet a changing market that is being polarized between high-end specialty business systems applications and low-end discount sales.

Apple Computer, Compaq Computer Corp. and IBM Corp., which have long dominated business systems sales, are opening up distribution channels and making some of their products available to mass-merchandising outlets that previously enjoyed considerable success selling clones.

IBM introduced its PS/1 home computer with an alliance with Sears, Roebuck & Co. and regional department stores. Dell Computer Corp., which traditionally has relied on mail order, now makes its wares available at superstore chains, such as CompUSA, and office-supply chains, such as Staples Inc.

Superstores, meanwhile, are enjoying explosive growth.

ognition and upgrading their quality image, analysts say.

"The margin charged for a logo ain't what it used to be," says William Zachmann, president of Canopus Research, a market researcher.

But, he adds, marketers will emphasize their brand names.

"The Apples and IBMs of the world will become much more competitive on price in response to loss of market share. The up-and-coming brands will work to establish a brand and image."

Apple, which has kept a strong image, is putting its focus on its product line and competitive pricing. New TV, newspaper and magazine ads broke last month for its Macintosh-compatible notebook computers themed "The revolution continues" from BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles. "The power to be your best" is the tagline.

"If you look at the companies that have done well in 1991 in a recession, whether it has been tacos or soft drinks or hotel rooms or airlines or computers, it's been those companies that have been most aggressive in pricing," says John Sculley, Apple chairman-ceo. "So we put a major focus on pricing and . . . on new product development."

"There may be a temporary move by the big guys toward price orientation, but it can't be sustained," says Jim Rose, VP-account supervisor on the Compaq business for O&M.

The price difference between premium-name PCs and clones has fallen from about 50% to about 15% now, but the big-name marketers can't undercut the competition, Mr. Rose says. As a result, he says, major computer marketers have to move toward more established brand orientation or give the market to low-cost producers.

"Compaq, IBM and everyone else has to explain why they are better," he says.

"Our national advertising will be focused more on the IBM logo. . . . [There will be] a regrouping around the IBM brand," Mr. Garrity says.

For clone marketers to compete against the premium-name marketers' messages, they'll have to establish their products' value.

Analysts point to Dell Computer Corp.'s success in breaking out of the IBM-compatible clone pack with a hard-hitting comparative campaign targeting rival Compaq that broke in September 1990.

With bold spread ads headlined "Top of the mark" over the Dell products and "Top of the markup" over the Compaq products, Dell was able to put itself in the same league as Compaq, but position itself with a price advantage.

Dell presently is being sued by Compaq and has backed off from the campaign, although it denies the lawsuit is the reason for doing so.

The key for other clone makers will be to establish in PC buyers' minds that their brand names convey an impression of quality, despite carrying a lower price.

"Name recognition is important for the smaller, new players," says Bruce Stephen, an analyst with market researcher International Data Corp. "There are a number of Asian, Taiwanese companies with no solid brand image. They need to upgrade their image from a clone-maker to a quality provider of systems to the corporate marketplace." □

1991 sales of $600 million, has 20 stores now and ambitious plans. The company plans to open 20 stores a year until it serves major U.S. markets and then move abroad.

CompuAdd, a computer manufacturer, mail-order house and retailer, now has 115 stores of varying sizes nationwide and expects to have 200 stores by the end of 1992.

Tandy Corp., the parent of the 7,000-store Radio Shack chain, is increasing its already considerable retail presence by expanding into the superstore segment. By yearend, it will open eight Computer City Super-Centers, which will sell Tandy, Apple, Compaq and IBM computers. It plans to open 15 to 20 new stores a year and sees sales possibly reaching $1 billion by 1995, according to company estimates.

Mass merchandisers, consumer electronics chains and office supply superstores also continue to bolster their computer offerings. PCs now are regularly advertised by mass merchandisers and by consumer electronics chains, such as Best Buy Co. and Highland Superstores. Office supply chains, such as BizMart, Office Club, Office Depot and Staples also are

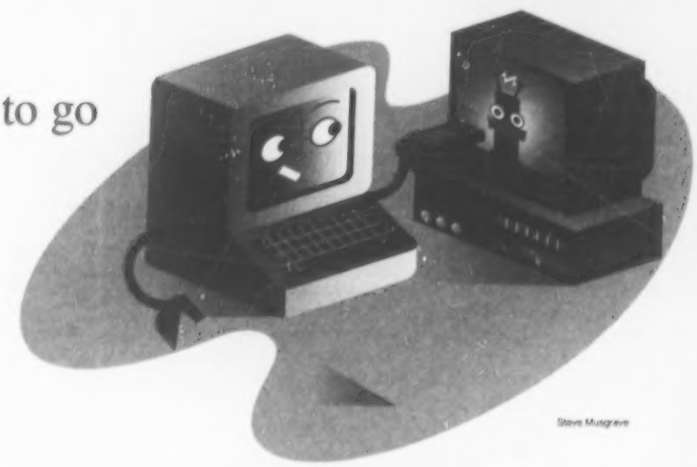
Multimedia PC systems have long way to go



Steve Musgrave

By Junu Bryan Kim

Supporters of multimedia computers say this innovation has to be seen—and heard—to be believed. But they also hope it'll be purchased.

As the PC turns into a lower-profit commodity, marketers see multimedia computing as the sparks for sales of new PCs and upgrade kits—and the profits that come with them. But if and when this happens—especially with new multimedia-ready PCs selling for about $3,000—remains to be seen.

"In the long term, this will have a large impact on the industry," says Michael Miller, editor of PC Magazine. But, he cautions, "things are just beginning to happen. You don't get overnight success [in this industry]."

Multimedia computers incorporate still pictures, video and audio with the text that's used in current PCs. For instance, an encyclopedia software package might feature video, graphics and sound accompanying the text. To be multimedia-ready, a PC must have a CD-ROM drive, which reads data stored on compact discs; an audio board to reproduce sounds; and certain memory, speed and graphics specifications.

The combination of pictures and words is what makes multimedia computing an industry buzzword. In fact, although neither Apple Computer nor IBM Corp. currently produces multimedia PCs, one of their joint venture companies, Kaleida, is working to develop software and propose technical standards.

Although multimedia PCs have been unveiled only within the last few months, the system's enthusiasts have touted the apparatus as being a more powerful communications device and an easier way to gain access to more information for businesses and consumers.

"The problem now with computers is that it's mainly presented text. But multimedia can present a message in various media," allowing the recipient to interpret the audiovisual features of an object or event, says Nick Arnett, president and chief analyst at Multimedia Computing Corp., a market researcher and publisher.

"Information will no longer need to be in a static form. It can be made alive with animation, graphics and multimedia applications," says Marc Miller, director of multimedia for NEC Technologies.

Multimedia computers can be used in school classrooms to enliven lessons.

"It's a way to take a class to Mt. Everest," Mr. Arnett says.

In business, multimedia computers can be used to create presentations, train employees and provide data to consumers through interactive store kiosks, observers say. These uses will help boost sales of multimedia PC equipment to the corporate sector from $4.7 billion this year to $22 billion in 1995, according to estimates from computer consultancy Inteco Corp. By that year, the most sales of multimedia equipment will go to businesses, for use in presentations and desktop publishing, and schools.

In the home, observers see multimedia computers being used similarly to the current PC: entertainment, learning and at-home work.

But the $3,000-and-up price tag for a new multimedia PC makes some wonder whether these advances will help boost PC penetration of the consumer market past its current 25% figure.

"To those on the edge [of buying a PC], this may convince them," Mr. Arnett says. But multimedia computer uses "are not applications that will motivate people to buy millions of computers."

Marketers respond by saying the existing computer-owning market is ripe for multimedia upgrades, which cost about $800.

"The main misunderstanding about multimedia is that people are assuming that this is a $3,000 purchase decision, and that only people who can afford to buy one to a dozen of these new $3,000 computers are going to be interested," says Ed Juge, director of market planning for Tandy Corp.'s Radio Shack.

The key element hinges on having an abundance of software applications. Just as word processing and spreadsheet applications spurred interest in the PC at the office and at home, multimedia marketers need practical home and office applications for their products. Buyers won't snap up these products solely for the love of the technology; they need to know what the technology can offer them.

"It's very easy to understand what a camcorder or a VCR does. It's difficult to explain what a multimedia interactive system does," Mr. Arnett says.

Currently there are 60 software applications titles available, but next year there should be another 100 titles on the market, according to Marc Miller.

One of the better-known packages is Microsoft Corp.'s "Multimedia Beethoven: The Ninth Symphony," which lets users listen to this work while analyzing its four movements, or read about what was happening in the composer's life while he wrote the piece.

But whether a software application will emerge to spur multimedia sales the way word processing boosted PC sales remains to be seen. For instance, observers figure a presentation or training package will bolster multimedia use in the office. But, Michael Miller says, "I can't say there's something [like that] out now."

If the software library grows, marketers expect big things from the multimedia market.

"It's going to be mainstream within three to five years," Mr. Juge says. "By then, finding a PC without multimedia will be like trying to find a new car in Texas without air conditioning."

But Mr. Arnett warns marketers not to expect too much too soon.

"People have high short-term expectations and low long-term expectations" for multimedia, he says. □ boosting floor space to accommodate computers and adding name brands.

"We position ourselves as a complete office product superstore," says Ron Stegall, ceo of BizMart, which is adding Apple, Compaq, IBM and Toshiba products to its stores. "Computers are an office product, too."

These changes spell potential problems for traditional computer dealers, unless they adapt to the changing marketplace.

Some local players, such as Computers Etc. in Peabody, Mass., are transforming themselves into superstores by cutting prices and expanding product offerings.

All the major players of the 1980s—Businessland, Computerland and Intelligent Electronics—are repositioning themselves for the 1990s.

JWP Businessland, the end result of JWP's acquisition of Businessland this year, has abandoned the retail market altogether.

Instead, it's focusing on value-added services, such as a direct sales force that focuses on systems integration and sales of equipment to large corporate and government clients.

The chain is the No. 2 reseller in the market, according to Computer Reseller News, with over $2 billion in sales projected for 1991. Last year, the publication estimates JWP and Businessland generated a total of $1.9 billion in revenues.

Computerland, which has 644 branches worldwide, also is consolidating operations. It has closed stores in major markets and is using a direct sales force to court the business market.

The company, which Computer Reseller News estimates as being the top reseller in the market with $2.5 billion in revenues projected for 1991, also opened its first superstore in Atlanta this year.

"If [computer resellers] can maintain their focus and service accounts with their technical expertise, then their future is bright," Mr. Kass says. "But if they try to be all things to all people, it's not." □

Magazines defend their niches

After shakeouts, top tier of books wield strength

By Scott Donaton

The rich will get richer and the poor will get poorer in computer publishing in the coming years, industry observers say.

Despite at least two major shakeouts in the last decade and a thinning out of the field, the computer segment remains one of publishing's most crowded with an estimated 200-plus trade and consumer magazines and newspapers.

The emergence of several titles as leaders of the entire field could spell trouble for the smaller, more specialized titles.

The leading PC magazines that survived shakeouts in the field in 1984 and 1989 now are solidifying their niches within the field.

As their efforts succeed and overall growth in the computer book segment cools, observers say many of the smaller, more specialized computer books—especially those that duplicate the editorial missions of established counterparts—are likely to get squeezed out.

"All of the magazines are very different, and they're different by design."
Ronni Sonnenberg
publisher, PC Magazine

"Differentiation is always a problem in a crowded marketplace," says Ken Norton, senior sales promotion manager for Interface Group, a high-tech agency in Needham, Mass. "There is a limit to the market's ability to support dozens of these publications."

"It's not uncommon when an industry segment that has mushroomed the way the computer field has for publishers to look and say, 'Wow, here's an opportunity to make a few dollars,' " says Curtis Wright, president of Battenberg, Fillhardt & Wright in San Jose, Calif.

"That's well and good if the book serves a real editorial purpose," he says. "But as time goes along, the less meaningful ones will fall by the wayside. I think we'll see a shakeout before the end of '92."

The strain of a crowded stable of titles is starting to show.

Ad pages in computer publications were down 3% in the first half of 1991 compared with the same period last year, the first decline in volume since 1988, according to a study of 72 computer books by Adscope, which tracks ad pages in computer titles.

But PC-specific books, which have been successful at communicating their individual personalities, saw ad page volume rise 16% in the first half of 1991, according to Adscope.

PC Magazine, the clear category leader, focuses on comparative product reviews. Byte is a more technical read. PC World is management-oriented. PC Week and InfoWorld are controlled. PC Computing focuses on computer solutions to business problems.

But beyond the PC category and a handful of other titles, the results aren't as promising.

Ad pages in data processing/management information systems titles were down 16%, and the engineering/scientific field was down 5% in the first half of These days, technology has to serve everybody. The trouble is, everyone wants technology to do something different.

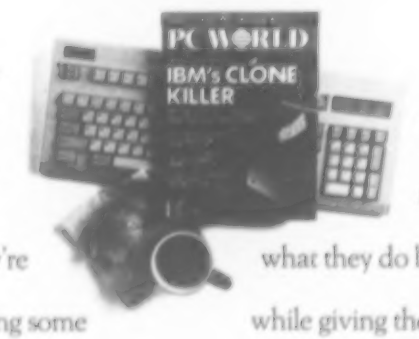
IS managers, for instance, are apt to put a very strategic spin on things. That's because they're charged with delivering information throughout the enterprise, integrating the company's computing and communications resources.

If there were only one kind of computer buyer, we'd only have one computer publication.

CIO's tend to look at the whole enterprise another way. After all, they're tackling some of the very trickiest issues in business. Like how to best use technology to produce the greatest business management gains.

Department managers, on the other hand, have to focus on doing just what their name implies. So they're more concerned with the productivity issues in their own backyard, their local area networks, and generally making sure their department is happy and humming along.

End users, however, have a different perspective entirely. They see the world from their desktop. They want whatever helps them do what they do better—while giving them access to the rest of the workgroup or a mainframe.



the year. Titles disappearing in 1991 included Computer Design News, Computer Publishing, Macintosh Aided Design and Netware Technical Journal.

In addition, industry observers say readers are hard-pressed to differentiate among the rest of the pack.

Mark Evans, partner at Santa Clara, Calif.-based Bricker Evans, says focus groups conducted by the agency show "there seems to be a hard time for people to differentiate, and we see this as a concern."

Most computer buyers are deluged with specialty computer publications but don't have the time or inclination to read them all, he says.

In a crowded field of computer books, publications like PC Magazine, PC World, PC Computing and Byte are trying to corner specific areas of the computer-user market.

"They're overloaded with magazines, they get many of them for free and they don't seem to have loyalty to any one magazine. It's very overwhelming to them," he says.

Mr. Evans says the agency's research has found most volume buyers receive four or five computer publications on a regular basis.

But, he says, he doubts there will be a shakeout in the field as long as advertisers continue to support many of the existing books.

"The pressure can only come from advertisers, and there's no pressure from that end," he says. "Advertisers' budgets are not focused. They're scattering their budgets, and that helps a lot of marginal players stay in business."

PC magazine publishers, however, dismiss study group findings that show readers can't tell one computer magazine from the other.

"That is in contrast to everything I've seen everywhere," says Ronni Sonnenberg, publisher of PC Magazine. "All of the magazines are very different as far as I'm concerned, and they're different by design."

While PC Magazine's studies indicate many readers do receive more than one computer publication, she says there is little audience duplication among the bigger-circulation, general interest PC publications.

"I'm not sure that anecdotal research, which you get with focus groups, is a good way to judge questions of overall magazine readership," says Patrick Kenealy, publisher of PC World. "The actual demographic research and circulation results of the bigger PC books say the readerships are becoming more distinct."

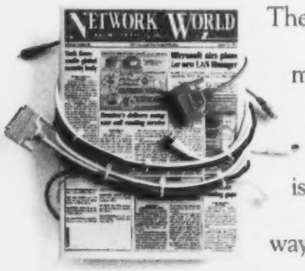
He, too, believes the strong will continue to get stronger in PC publishing in the '90s while marginal titles will fall by the wayside.

"The survivors have survived and now they have to differentiate themselves," he adds. "I don't think you're going to see many of the big magazines go out of business anymore."

But at least one media buyer believes more titles may be better and that the proliferation of computer books will continue.

"I think we'll see a lot more magazines come out in the field, a lot of niche players and specialization, more vertical books," says David Yoder, VP-media director at Anderson & Lembke, San Francisco, a business-to-business division of Chiat/Day/Mojo.

He says the agency's research has found that "people who read a lot of publications influence [buying decisions] more. Your power readers are the ones who are buying more product." □



Then there's senior management. To them, technology is one of the best ways to gain a strategic, competitive advantage. Or, at least, it better be.

The point is, everybody's involved. All these groups influence each other. That's why, today, there's no one person who's responsible for buying technology for the many. Instead, in the networked corporation, there is a network of people who are responsible for buying and implementing technology, each responding to different needs and demands.

That's why they all need different kinds of information, presented in different ways, to help them do their jobs. And why we have more than one kind of computer publication.

In fact, IDG has more ways to reach more of your market than anyone. We also know more than anyone about how information technology is bought, having just completed the largest independent study of the buying process ever conducted.

It's called, "Buying IT in the 90s: The People, Patterns, and Process." And we'd like to share it with you. Just call Erica Baccus, our V.P. of Marketing, at 1-617-534-1210, for a free copy of the Executive Summary.

Operating systems get 2nd look

Is DOS the future? Users seem ready to go beyond

By Junu Bryan Kim

Three letters have helped contribute to the phenomenal growth of the personal computer industry: D-O-S.

The prominence of Microsoft Corp.'s MS-DOS operating system, which along with its enhancement program—Windows—today owns an estimated 90% of the operating system market, has facilitated PC use.

But the emergence of other operating systems could lead to the fragmentation of this market. At that time, not only must users bet on a system, but so must PC marketers.

When other operating systems besides DOS become entrenched in the PC market, "People are going to have to line up on one side or the other, especially if there are hardware implications," says Joe Taglia, VP-Americas territory at Digital Research, a software company.

The operating system is the software program that controls a computer's basic functions. Because software applications are written to run on certain operating systems, and because not all operating systems are compatible with all computers, PC marketers want their wares to support an operating system that provides consumers with a sufficient selection of applications.

History has shown the operating system plays a role in determining the success of a computer marketer.

■ When Compaq introduced its advanced Systempro computer system in late 1989, the company offered to equip it with whatever operating system a customer wanted.

"But they didn't align themselves, and it hurt them," says Stewart Alsop, editor in chief of the trade journal InfoWorld. "There's no real evidence that customers want that sort of choice; they'd look at it as chaos."

■ Because PC clones run on DOS, just as the original PCs made by IBM Corp. did, clone makers could offer a product that worked just like IBM's and promote their lower prices.

"Because of the fact that DOS worked across multiple manufacturers' machines, there are Compaq, Dell, AST Research, Gateway and the rest," says Michael Miller, editor of PC Magazine.

■ Apple Computer carved out its slice of the PC market with its Macintosh operating system, which is more user-friendly than DOS.

"The company that's done the best job in selling itself based on its operating system is Apple. It's done that by not being compatible," Mr. Miller says.

Aside from MS-DOS, the competing operating systems include IBM Corp., whose much-ballyhooed OS/2 2.0, an update of the current OS/2 product, won't be released until early next year, several months behind schedule; variants of Unix, a powerful operating system originally developed by AT&T Co. and adopted by various companies for use mainly in workstations; and Digital Research's DR DOS, a version of MS-DOS.

Also seen as competitors are various DOS "shells," such as Windows and GeoWorks' GeoWorks Ensemble, that turn DOS into a "point-and-click," graphic-based system, like Apple's Macintosh system. These programs aren't true operating systems—they can't run software without DOS—but because software writers have created applications to be used on them, they're considered operating system competitors.

Microsoft has sold 6 million copies of Windows 3.0 since its debut in spring 1990; IBM has sold about 600,000 copies of OS/2 since its '87 debut.

PC marketers currently favor DOS inclusion in their wares because the market demands it. "A lot of [PC makers] want to be lined up with Microsoft. They want Microsoft's operating system because that's what customers want," Mr. Miller says.

In fact, the concept of fragmentation within the operating systems market assumes one point: that users will switch from DOS.

Some observers claim users have invested too much money in DOS applications and too much time learning these programs to switch from DOS. "I question the premise that there will be a big breakup in the preference of operating systems," says Ed Juge, director of market planning for Tandy Corp.'s Radio Shack.

Any operating system developer looking to solidify a share of this market will have to create a product that's compatible with DOS, observers say.

"Full-scale fragmentation would only be possible if the operating systems were interchangeable," says Cheryl Currid, president of computer consultancy Currid & Co.

Despite DOS' power over this market, other insiders say users are outgrowing DOS' capabilities. A sudden switch from DOS to something else might be improbable, but the need for another system is emerging.

A recent survey commissioned by PC Magazine found that the percentage of businesses maintaining DOS as their single operating system will drop from 46% this year to 36% next year. Meanwhile, the percentage of companies that will use two or more operating systems as their standards will jump from 27% to 34% in the same period.

Because of Windows' success, "There's clearly a market for something better than DOS," Mr. Miller says. "[DOS] works and will be around forever, but it's no longer what people want. People want a graphical user interface, they want multitasking [the ability to run multiple programs at once], they want something that's point and click and easier to use. Windows is a step in that direction."

The popularity of Windows forces PC vendors to make their first real decision on operating systems.

Conceivably, if the demand for Windows is that great, a PC marketer could establish an advantage by "bundling" or installing Windows into its PCs in the factory. But because most operating-system developers will license their product to whomever wants it, any advantage achieved can't be considered permanent.

"If you want Windows and you can get a temporary advantage by bundling it, that's great. But the next thing you know, someone else will bundle it," Mr. Miller says.

But future decisions on operating systems could involve more choices for PC marketers, as they try to anticipate the wishes of their customers.

Many corporate buyers are likely to put the decision on whether to adopt a new operating system on hold for six months or a year while they evaluate prospects for the IBM/-Apple joint venture, says Nancy McSharry, an analyst at market researcher International Data Corp.

"Making the wrong decision: That's what [buyers] are nervous about," says Esther Dyson, editor and publisher of the computer newsletter Release 1.0.

Microsoft won't be toppled from its dominant position in the operating systems market for at least two years, Mr. Alsop predicts. But the IBM/Apple joint venture could produce a formidable competitor. The operating system goal of this venture is to create an object-oriented operating system that would simplify the process of users creating their own software. However, its release isn't expected until mid-decade.

"If you're talking five or six years down, I think it's possible, and that's what Apple and IBM are doing," Mr. Alsop says.

Still, computer manufacturers can distinguish their products in more tangible ways than promoting an operating systems allegiance, Mr. Miller says. His suggestion: promote performance, service and technical support.

"The bigger challenge is to come up with new and better ways of using computers. That's the issue, not what operating system people are going to use, because I don't think people care that much. They care about applications and solutions, not operating systems," Mr. Miller says. □

Agency schism widens

For emerging computer accounts, the old debate renews as big shops square off with boutiques

By Laurie Freeman

The current campaign for Momenta Corp.'s pen-based computer has not only introduced a new type of technology, it's reheated a brewing debate among high-tech and mainstream ad agencies.

Representatives of both specialized, high-tech agencies and mainstream shops feel their respective businesses are better suited to create ads and buy space for computer clients.

Specialized agencies complain mainstream agencies don't know anything about computer books.

"Their eyes glaze over because they don't understand the industry," says Mark Evans, a partner at high-tech agency Bricker Evans, Santa Clara, Calif., which handles B.T. North America.

Meantime, mainstream agencies claim specialized agencies wear blinders when it comes to placing computer ads.

Those bigger shops claim the specialists often look no further than niche media when buying media.

"Mainstream agencies don't come to the business with so many preconceived notions about what you can and cannot do," notes Curtis Wright, president, Battenberg, Fillhardt & Wright, San Jose, Calif., which handles the MacVision Macintosh video scanning system, along with agribusiness, bank and hospital accounts.

The schism between mainstream and specialized agency media buyers has reemerged with the current $2 million print campaign for Momenta, which selected Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, as its agency of record.

John Rizzo, Momenta's VP-marketing, interviewed both specialty technology agencies and broader-based consumer agencies. He says he opted to go with a consumer agency because he was not looking to duplicate what his company already knew about the computer marketplace.

"We chose to place our investment in educating the agency about technology, not [educating them about] consumers," Mr. Rizzo says. "We need to add people to our team that have skills that we don't have. Why do we need someone who knows everything we know?"

Whether Momenta and Riney's initial print strategy, which includes ads in The Wall Street Journal, brings in eager buyers is yet to be determined. But mainstream agencies view this media decision as one that will be copied by more and more high-tech companies. For example, Novell Inc., the leader in PC networking, has placed spreads for its NetWare networking software not only in recent issues of business books, but also in Time.

Lintas' J Kosanke believes mainstream agencies "are in a better position to understand what to do with" computer information.

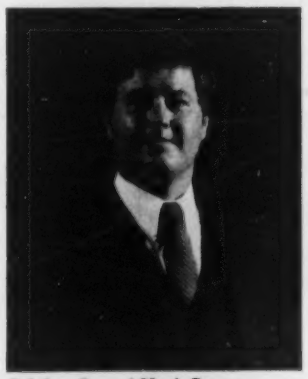
"As computers become more common, you run the risk of talking to yourself if you rely exclusively on people who specialize in the tech computer industry. You need breakthrough thinking," says J Kosanke, senior VP-group media director, Lintas:New York, which handles the IBM Corp. account.

The smart companies already know that, Mr. Kosanke contends, and they are interested in working with advertising agencies that are keen to pursue new media strategies.

"There certainly are more opportunities to advertise computers other than the high-tech magazines, and it does make it more difficult to isolate who your target [audience] is. But a mainstream agency would be in a better position to understand that and understand what to do with that information," he says.

Yet specialized agencies argue their mainstream counterparts truly do not understand the complexities and intricacies of computer industry print media.



Bricker Evans' Mark Evans contends big agency employees' "eyes glaze over because they don't understand the industry."

"Only an intimate knowledge of those print vehicles that are very targeted can make a small budget work," asserts Ken Norton, senior sales promotion manager of specialist shop Interface Group, Needham, Mass. "Those kinds of trade publications tend to change rapidly, and you need to have your ear to the ground to know which are losing ground and which are the hot books."

That kind of attention, Mr. Norton argues, can be found only at the specialized high-tech agencies.

Another gripe of the specialized agency heads is that mainstream agencies care only about the numbers—costs per thousand and circulation—and not the editorial direction of these magazines.

As a result, they say, smaller-book publishers looking to get some of these big-client dollars are increasing circulation—and, consequently, ad rates—beyond what's affordable for many small and midsize computer companies.

"The publications are doing this. They're pumping up their circulations and rates because they know that's what the larger, mainstream agencies are looking for," Mr. Evans says.

"Mainstream agencies have beginner media buyers who are crunching numbers, and the publishers are reacting to that," he adds.

While that may be the case at some agencies, other mainstream agencies have recognized buying computer media demands additional expertise. At Riney, having a group of people concentrate on one specific area, like computers or travel, helps overcome the knowledge gap.

"It's tough to get 120 planners up to speed on high-tech media, but it's possible to put together a team like we have, who are high-tech fluent," says David Verklin, senior VP-corporate media director at Riney.

Realizing high-tech accounts require some particular skills, Mr. Kosanke has kept people on the IBM account longer than the agency might on other accounts.

"It takes more time to understand the field and its publications, but this is not an insurmountable problem," he says.

And for some agencies, it's simply a case of finding the right people to handle high-tech accounts.

"To me, it depends more upon the expertise of the planner on the account rather than the agency itself," says Connie White, media director at Evans/Salt Lake City, which handles WordPerfect Corp., a software company.

"Mainstream shops generally have one or two people who specialize in a particular industry, doing research and keeping on top of developments in the field," she says.

"And that's what you need to be successful." □

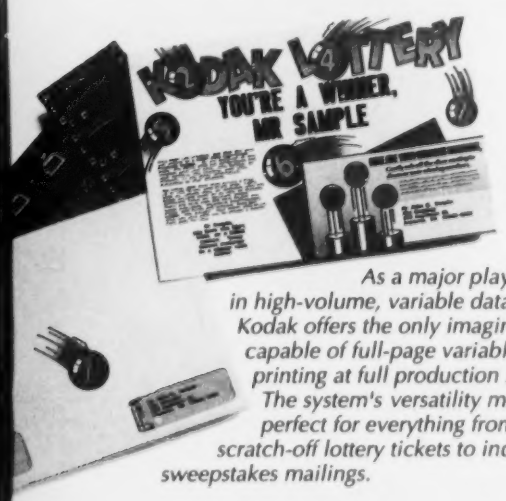
Ink makes it personal. There was a time when the most sincere notes and the most important documents were written and individually signed by hand using quill and ink. Since then, ink has been the long standing and classic means of expressing personal involvement in a message. Time has also proven ink to be a most powerful means of eliciting a personal response.

Now, Kodak combines the potential of advanced technology with the powerful personal touch of ink. Here are only a few examples of how high-quality, Kodak ink-jet technology can bring innovative solutions to personal printing.

If you're interested in improving your image and getting more personal with your customers, call (513) 259-3100, or write Eastman Kodak Company, Dayton Operations, 3100 Research Boulevard, Dayton, Ohio 45420-4099.

With direct mail ink-jet imaging not only avoids the perils of paper labels, but also provides greater versatility and improved response rates. Kodak ink-jet gives you the highest quality imaging for addressing and the flexibility to position personalized messages practically anywhere. You also get bar codes with tested readability rates of 100%. All Kodak products have received US Postal Service POSTNET bar code certification.



As a major player in high-volume, variable data imaging, Kodak offers the only imaging system capable of full-page variable-data printing at full production speeds. The system's versatility makes it perfect for everything from instant scratch-off lottery tickets to individualized sweepstakes mailings.

Dual image, ink-jet synchronization lets you move from conventional addressing to creative addressing. For catalogs you can address as well as deliver personalized messages both inside and outside. And, you can address and code inside order forms to solicit response and speed fulfillment. For magazines, Kodak's Selective Imaging and Gathering means ads can be selectively bound in and personalized. Individualized messages can be imaged both inside and outside for maximum impact and reader involvement.

Pared budgets by McDonald's, other pacesetters, thwart ad growth of Top 200.

THE TOP 200 BRANDS

Belt-tightening takes toll on leading brands

By R. Craig Endicott

Like a McLean Deluxe at McDonald's restaurants, ad spending by the nation's Top 200 Brands is slimming down.

The elite group, ranging from largest advertiser McDonald's $195.2 million in first-half national media spending to Winn-Dixie Stores' $14.6 million, boosted its ad outlays to $7.4 billion, up 3.6% compared with the prior-year period but down from a 6.2% increase first quarter.

Second-quarter returns—5.8% below same-period 1990 levels that were particularly strong—put the Top 200 Brands in the same downward spiral other advertisers felt in the first half.

Yet, the group is still the fulcrum on which the nation's media hang in the balance. Its first-half growth far outdistanced the decline of 7.8% to $18.4 billion in media for all advertisers, according to Advertising Age's Top 200 Brands listing based on 10 measured media supplied by LNA/Arbitron (see full chart on Page 42).

The sudden erosion in Top 200 spending stems largely from the top five brands. Collectively, the brands, representing 11% of Top 200 spending, cut $178.5 million from media compared with the first half of 1990. Remove the top five in both years and the rest of the Top 200 boosted spending 7.1%.

Ad volume for each of the top five brands declined. As if dining on its new menu, McDonald's first-half totals fell 10.9%; No. 2 Kellogg breakfast foods dropped 13.2%; No. 3 Ford cars slipped 2.8%; No. 4 AT&T telephone services slumped 27.4%; and No. 5 Sears, Roebuck & Co. stores plunged 28.1%.

Of these media cuts, $165 million alone came out of network TV, which traditionally claims about half of the media budgets behind these five brands. As a result, network TV dropped 2.4% to $3.03 billion for the Top 200.

Among the Top 200, Kellogg, the network TV leader, sliced its network total 28.7% to $113.7 million in the first half. The 200's three biggest ad volume categories—food, restaurants and automotive—were down 15%, 14% and 9%, respectively, in network TV.

By contrast, the Top 200 carried spot TV, contributing $1.4 billion in first-half spending, up 2.9% compared with a 6.2% decline to $4.1 billion for all advertisers. Conversely, spot TV showed growth in food, restaurants and automotive categories among the Top 200.

The Top 200 similarly did well by magazines, boosting their spending in that depressed medium by 5.7% to $941 million, compared with a 5.6% decline to $3.1 billion by all advertisers. For newspapers, the Top 200 may have kept the dike from bursting. They supported the medium with $845.7 million, down 2.7% but still far better than the 21.7% shortfall to $3.3 billion recorded for all national newspaper spenders.

Syndicated TV continued its impressive expansion, attracting $498 million from the Top 200 in the first half, up 33.6%. All ad spending in the medium grew 23.8% to $899.8 million. All major ad categories showed gains in syndicated TV, a medium that includes Fox Broadcasting Co.

Expenditures from Detroit and Tokyo automakers reflected reduced auto showroom traffic as first-half spending for the 29-brand category rose only 2.7% to $1.69 billion. The quarterly trend line, however, went from plus 6.8% in the first quarter to minus 2.4% in the second, compared to prior-year levels.

Detroit, after revving up spending 17.9% in the first quarter, cut media outlays 1.6% in the second for an overall 7.5% gain to $901.2 million in first-half spending. With first-half spending at $630.5 million, up 0.2%, the Japanese edged into the plus column because of their 2.7% gain in second-quarter spending. They had a 2.3% first-quarter decline.

The 13 brands' retail category plunged 16.8% to $575.3 million, largely due to a 25.1% decline in newspapers, down to $238 million. The food category also grew lean as spending for 23 brands dropped 3% to $840.3 million.

Philip Morris Cos. led all advertisers during the period with $646.4 million in media spending, down 1.4% for all its brands, some $130 million more than runner-up GM. PM's nine brands among the 200 contributed 69.2% of its total, while GM's eight Top 200 brands accounted for 94.5% of its total. Procter & Gamble Co., third in total advertising, cut media outlays by 12.7% to $499.6 million.

New product activity and recession-oriented products added a new mix to the list. The drug category, with growth of 39.8% to $214.6 million, was new-product-driven, largely by two vaginal yeast creams—Johnson & Johnson's Monistat-7, ranked No. 147, and Schering-Plough's Gyne-Lotrimin cream, ranked No. 145. □

Radio fights recession

KYW-AM seeks ads from other local stations

PHILADELPHIA—Group W Radio's top-rated KYW-AM, an all-news station, is soliciting advertising from an unexpected source: other stations.

VP-General Manager Roy Shapiro contacted local AM and FM stations of all formats, offering exclusivity to a single station advertising on KYW.

He said a non-exclusive arrangement might be offered if advertising stations didn't object.

"It's an opportunity for our station to realize additional revenues," Mr. Shapiro said. "This was a source of revenue we never sought. . . . We think there is risk involved. But we looked at all the variables and thought the positives more than outweigh the negatives."

KYW is the only all-news station in the market.

Five stations have inquired, but no deal has been signed yet, he said.

Ad rates would be higher for other stations, and "we reserve the right to make a judgment on [the content] of their commercials," Mr. Shapiro said.

"It would be perfect for our radio station because we share a lot of listeners with KYW," said Meg DeLone, general manager of WEAZ-AM/FM, which has beautiful music and adult contemporary formats, respectively. "But I wouldn't pay that kind of money."

KYW is asking "probably double" what it charges other advertisers, Ms. DeLone said.

"What they are asking in terms of price, I don't see how we could justify it," she said.

KYW ranked No. 1 in the market with a 7.5 quarter-hour share among listeners 12 and older, according to Arbitron Co.'s summer 1991 ratings book. □

Radio's ad revenue slide slows down

NEW YORK—The radio industry may be pulling out of the recession. National and local ad revenues through third quarter were down only 3% from the same period for the year before, an improvement over the 5.2% decline for the first quarter and 3.9% decline for the first half.

Local radio ad revenues for January to September were down 3.2% from the year before; national revenues were down 2.1%.

While radio ad revenue is still down, the medium is improving at a faster rate than most other major media, with the exception of cable TV. □

Anti-AIDS ads draw top efforts

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Just nine months after its start-up by a committee of top ad executives, Ads Against AIDS last week unveiled the winners of its competition.

The challenge, to create ads that will build concern about the AIDS epidemic, was met because the industry "decided to go out and do something," said Jack Mariucci, exec VP-executive creative director at DDB Needham Worldwide and co-chairman of the group.

The winners, chosen from more than 1,000 entries, represent top-notch talent who donated millions of dollars in time, Mr. Mariucci said.

Voice-overs were done by actors James Earl Jones, Brian Dennehy and John Turturro and singer Tom Waits. Production companies included Giraldi/Suarez, RSA/-USA and Kira/H Films, all New York, and Tim Bieber Productions, Chicago.

Mr. Mariucci said he was surprised by the willingness of production companies to shuffle paying jobs and reach into their own pockets to finish the AIDS spots.

"Next year, maybe we can produce more," he said.

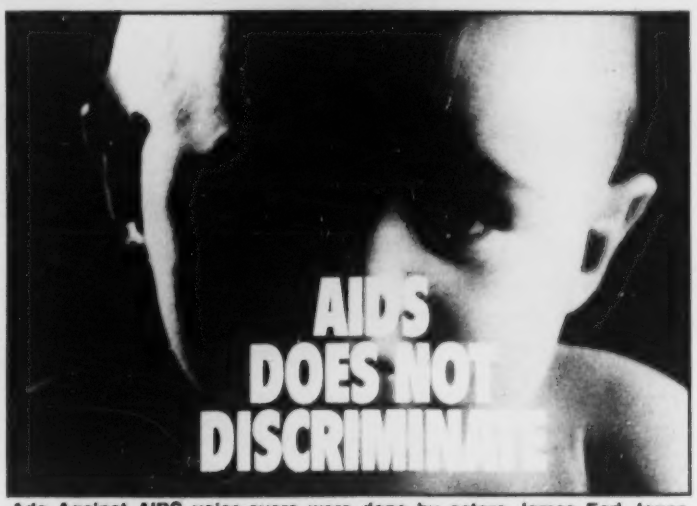
A media committee is now working to secure what organizers estimate as $30 million in TV, radio and print time and space.

The campaign strategy is to convince the adult target audience that the AIDS epidemic is of great concern to all and that everyone should donate time and money.

A TV spot created by Bill Yamada and Peter Bregman of Wells Rich Greene BDDP shows the small communities of Calhoun County, W. Va., and Lake County, Mich., where AIDS cases have been reported, to make the point that "No place is immune."

Demaine, Vickers & Associates, a small shop in Alexandria, Va., contributed a spot showing names disappearing from a phone book. "To AIDS, you're just another number," the spot says.

"Babies," a spot from Mark Fredericks and Steve Luzzatto of Warwick Baker & Fiore, superimposes words people associate with most victims of AIDS, such as "Junkie," "Queer" and "Slut" over the faces of newborns. "AIDS does not discriminate," the ad says.



Ads Against AIDS voice-overs were done by actors James Earl Jones, Brian Dennehy and John Turturro, and singer Tom Waits.

A spot by Eric David and Morleen Novitt of N W Ayer depicts a small town beset by a killer that no one is doing anything to stop.

"It's closer to home than you think" is the tagline.

A spot created by DDB Needham's Bob Adsit and Tom Baginski juxtaposes scenes of the homeless and junkies with "normal" people caring for relatives and worrying about their children.

Winning print ads were created by Gordon Bennett and Steve Landsberg of Calet, Hirsch & Spector, and freelancers David Thall and Robert Shulman.

"Baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and AIDS" was the headline for the Calet ad, while one of Messrs. Thall and Shulman's winning efforts was themed "Ten dangerous lies people tell themselves about AIDS."

Winning radio campaigns came from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, and Stupid Radio, Studio City, Calif.

The entries were judged by a committee composed of Mr. Mariucci; Helayne Spivak, Young & Rubicam exec VP-executive creative director; Neil Calet, Calet co-chairman; Jerry Della Femina, Della Femina, McNamee chairman; Phil Dusenberry, BBDO Worldwide vice chairman; Phyllis Robinson, president, Phyllis K. Robinson Inc.; and Robert Star, DDB Needham VP-associate creative director. □

Global spending patterns emerge

By Nancy Giges

NEW YORK—The lifestyles and spending habits of people ages 14 to 34 are similar around the globe, a new study found.

The study, commissioned by MTV: Music Television, was conducted by Yankelovich Clancy Shulman in Australia, Brazil, Germany, Japan, the U.K. and the U.S.

"While these are exciting times, they are also confusing and frightening, especially for young adults," said Marshall Cohen, MTV exec VP-research and strategic planning. The study "was conducted to gauge how this age group is responding to dramatic events occurring worldwide and to better understand how this age group conducts its everyday life."

The average person surveyed spent about $60 a week on discretionary items, ranging from $56 in the U.K. to $89 in Brazil. Total discretionary spending power of the age group in those countries was more than $14 billion annually.

A majority of those questioned in every country but Brazil had a savings or checking account or both, and almost two out of three U.S. and Japanese young adults had a credit card.

The percentage of those who had bought soft drinks in the past three months ranged from 83% in Germany to 96% in the U.S.; the U.S. and Australia led in fast-food consumption, 94%, with Germany the lowest, 70%. As for cigarette consumption, the U.K. led with 40% while the U.S. was the lowest with 24%. Beer consumption ranged from 60% in Brazil to 46% in the U.S. and Germany. Only those 18 and older were asked about beer and cigarette consumption.

Among other findings: TV ownership is virtually universal in all countries; stereo equipment and portable stereo ownership is close behind; and ownership of VCRs and compact disc players is relatively common.

Yankelovich surveyed 750 young people in the U.S. and 250 in each of the other countries last May and June via random telephone and personal interviews. The margin of error for the U.S. was plus or minus 4%; elsewhere it was plus or minus 6%. □

Clorox recycles bottles

By Bradley Johnson

Clorox Co., betting consumers will like mixing clean and green, is introducing recycled plastic packaging for four of its top brands.

The household goods marketer this month starts selling its signature chlorine bleach in bottles made of 20% recycled plastic. Clorox is also readying recycled packaging for Pine-Sol, Soft Scrub and Formula 409.

The new bleach bottle looks like the old one but contains a center layer of plastic reclaimed from milk and water jugs, said Sandy Sullivan, manager of marketing communications.

The launch will be supported by a free standing insert and limited print advertising in seven cities—Buffalo, N.Y.; Cincinnati, Cleveland, Columbus and Toledo, Ohio; Detroit; and Pittsburgh. Other regions will be phased in.

Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, handles Clorox bleach advertising. Creative Source, Boise, Idaho, created the FSI.

Clorox in February will begin marketing Pine-Sol cleaner in clear bottles made of 100% recycled plastic recovered from soda bottles. Ad plans aren't set; Young & Rubicam handles.

In the next year, the company will start marketing Soft Scrub cleanser and Formula 409 spray cleaner in bottles made of partially recycled plastic, said Michael Riley, Clorox director of environment marketing.

DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, handles Soft Scrub; FCB is 409's agency.

Clorox is following the lead of Procter & Gamble Co., which began marketing Spic & Span Pine in 100% recycled plastic in November 1988. P&G introduced 25% recycled detergent bottles in mid-1989.

This isn't Clorox's first move into environmental packaging. Recycled materials already account for about 17% of the company's packaging, Mr. Riley said. Recycled materials are used in shipping cartons as well as Hidden Valley Ranch salad dressing glass bottles and Clorox 2 dry bleach boxes. Mr. Riley said Clorox will continue to make only limited on-package claims about recycled content so as not to run afoul of regulators. □

By John P. Cortez

The Yellow Pages industry is taking steps to address national advertiser demands for Nielsen-like ratings research.

Two leading Yellow Pages marketing research companies have reached agreement to combine their syndicated audience measurement services, extending the larger company, the National Yellow Pages Monitor, into 56 major markets nationwide.

In the deal, National Yellow Pages Monitor bought the syndicated research arm of Advertising Research Corp.

Many industry insiders feel the emergence of National Yellow Pages Monitor as the apparent vendor of choice will cause previously undecided publishers to contract for syndicated research. That could ultimately lead to an increase in national advertiser business for Yellow Pages.

"Having one leader will be beneficial to the industry," said Larry Small, VP-marketing for the Yellow Pages Publishers Association.

The National Yellow Pages Monitor's growth and flexibility in methodology make it attractive to publishers, Mr. Small said.

The addition of Advertising Research Corp.'s 13 markets for 1991 measurement brings the Monitor's total to 56, covering eight publishers collectively representing more than 700 directories.

The merger "makes the research industry less fragmented, bringing us one step closer to a national ratings system," said Mary Ann Packo, Monitor president.

The next step, she said, is to reach more markets and add more publishers. Markets where research is particularly sparse include Chicago, New York and New England, she said.

National advertisers represent a large source of potential revenue for Yellow Pages publishers, and they want proof of usage before committing ad dollars, said Mary Kay Schuck, manager for market research at Southwestern Bell.

Like Nielsen ratings, National Yellow Pages Monitor uses a diary format in which a Yellow Pages user records all use for seven days. Different sample groups are used continuously throughout the year, and results are reported every six months.

The YPPA has changed its stance on the research, Mr. Small said. The association had thought research was an unnecessary expense that would merely cause a reallocation of existing revenue.

But today, Mr. Small said, syndicated research is "a cost of doing business. Our position changed because the advertising and media environment has changed." □

Divisions huddle to plot strategies in California

By Raymond Serafin and Cleveland Horton

General Motors Corp. has formed an unprecedented multidivisional task force that's focusing on California, the nation's biggest new-vehicle market.

GM officials refused comment, but sources say the project covers everything from advertising to inventory control.

The collaboration among divisions is unprecedented because individual brand identities are jealously protected at GM.

Those familiar with the project say it represents an important psychological and philosophical change in the auto marketer's approach that may eventually be applied to other regions.

Automakers, like other marketers, consider California an important bellwether for national trends.

"We're looking at California, but what works here may be picked up elsewhere," a source said.

The collaboration includes both GM corporate officials and representatives from the company's six vehicle-selling divisions. There have been three meetings so far, with as many as 50 participants.

"We're looking at California, but what works here may be picked up elsewhere."

The goal is to identify 10 basic marketing and sales strategies common to all GM divisions. Each division can then devise its own strategy and budget.

These budgets will include recommendations for corporate advertising funds to be spent in California.

It's expected that some significant marketing and promotional programs could emerge next year, if corporate officials approve funding.

One aspect involves Chevrolet, Pontiac, Buick, Oldsmobile, Cadillac and GMC Truck each working to identify key vehicles with upside potential for California sales without cannibalizing other GM divisions.

"We all agree that every division should have just a couple of core cars, opportunity cars for real volume," said a source who's attended meetings.

To date, GM subsidiary Saturn Corp. hasn't officially joined the project, though a Saturn representa-

Midsize shops suffer; Levine shuttered

By Gary Levin

Midsize ad agencies are rapidly becoming victims as advertisers continue to shift business to both bigger and smaller shops.

Levine, Huntley, Vick & Beaver, New York, last week was shut down and absorbed by parent Grey Advertising, a few months after the loss of its ceo and two of its biggest clients, Subaru of America and Frito-Lay.

■ Who will go after the $100M Mercedes-Benz account—Page 4.

McCaffrey & McCall's largest account, Mercedes-Benz of North America, last week put its estimated $100 million account up for review. That represents 33% of the agency's business and comes in the midst of another review by client Bacardi Imports.

Those moves underscore a growing concern that midsize shops—defined by the American Association of Advertising Agencies as $75 million to $500 million in billings—are on dangerous ground and could be headed for a shakeout.

Advertisers seem to prefer the resources of a multinational network or, alternatively, the entrepreneurial, hands-on approach of creative boutiques, say industry executives.

RJR siphons ad $ from magazines

By Judann Dagnoll and Scott Donaton

In another blow to the recession-plagued magazine industry, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. is cutting its media advertising budget and abandoning yearlong ad schedules in magazines for 1992.

RJR is also dropping long-term commitments to outdoor companies and will shift savings from both moves to point of purchase and consumer promotions.

Under the new policy, RJR will make more selective magazine buys on a quarter-by-quarter or issue-by-issue basis, depending on the brand being advertised, the company confirmed.

"Given the high probability of change in brand advertising activity, both in scope and timing, we will not be releasing annual schedules for any brand at this time," Dan Pearson, RJR senior media director said in a recent letter to publishers. "Instead, we will communicate individual brand schedules to you throughout the year as they are confirmed."

Starting this week, RJR is meeting with publishers to discuss the new policy. Publishing companies believed to be af-

Weight Watchers goes to Ally

PITTSBURGH—H.J. Heinz Co.'s Weight Watchers moved its estimated $30 million Weight Watchers Foods frozen entree account, plus the national launch of Ultimate 200 frozen entree and sandwich line, to Ally & Gargano, New York, from DDB Needham Worldwide, New York. Company President Brian Ruder said the move was only for January through April, but other sources said the move is permanent. DDB Needham lost the $30 million Weight Watchers Weight Loss System account earlier this year. Ally already has $10 million in other Weight Watchers' foods. Ultimate 200 will be supported by network TV spots, themed "Total indulgence. Zero guilt," breaking Dec. 31. Spot TV and radio and national magazine ads start early next year.

Unhappy New Year

Publishers see no ad rebound in January

By Scott Donaton

Magazine publishers have had their first glimpse of 1992, and for most of them, it looks an awful lot like 1991, or worse.

Publishers of monthly and every-other-monthly titles have closed or are about to close their January issues, and most said they see no sign of a rebound in ad pages.

In fact, several said January was softer than expected following a relatively healthy fourth quarter.

"Basically, we're looking at more of the same," said Gregory Dunn, publisher of Redbook. "In general, the tone, the mood, the close-to-the-vest planning, the lack of commitment are pretty consistent with what I've been used to for the last year and a half."

He said the Hearst Corp. monthly's ad pages were flat in January, compared with the same issue in 1991, a statement many other publishers wish they could make.

"I was hoping we'd come even with last year," said Carl Portale, publisher of Harper's Bazaar, where ad pages fell 16% for the January issue. "I don't want to finish 1992 16% off, [but] I think the market is going to stay soft."

January is traditionally a weak month for magazine ad sales, and publishers have said they don't expect an end to the industry's two-year slump before mid-1992. Still, many said they're surprised by the depth of the decline for January 1992.

LeMenu goes American

Campbell hopes new line heats up frozen dinner sales

By Judann Dagnoli

Campbell Soup Co. is repositioning LeMenu frozen dinners with a new line styled after casual eateries such as Bennigan's, Houlihan's and T.G.I. Friday's.

The company will introduce nationally LeMenu New American Cuisine, a 12-item premium line, in January backed by $18 million in advertising.

New American Cuisine takes a page from casual restaurants and offers such non-traditional frozen dinner "side components" as rice and black bean medley, spinach and mushroom gratin, and cranberry cornbread stuffing.

Media support from Ogilvy & Mather, New York, includes network TV, radio and couponing starting in mid-February.

With New American Cuisine, Campbell "plans to break through the clutter in the freezer case once again by drawing on current food and restaurant trends as the inspiration," said Murray Kessler, premium meals business director for Campbell.

The original LeMenu line, introduced in 1982, was modeled after dinners found in white-tablecloth French restaurants.

The new varieties appear to run counter to the current trend in the $1.26 billion frozen dinner category toward more home-style, mainstream offerings. But Mr. Kessler maintained New American Cuisine combines the best of both worlds.

The main courses are mostly tried-and-

Henkel could exit Euro RSCG over P&G

By Laurel Wentz and Dagmar Mussey

Henkel is considering firing Euro RSCG from its $100 million European account to pre-empt the agency from resigning its business in order to keep Procter & Gamble Co., sources say.

Henkel is said to be tired of Euro RSCG's prolonged maneuvering to keep both P&G's U.S. business at Tatham/RSCG and Henkel's European account at Eurocom in the wake of last month's merger of Eurocom and Roux Seguela Cayzac & Goudard.

"The feeling of the Henkel management is we're not going to sit here and wait to be ousted by an agency network," said a source familiar with Henkel.

"The feeling of the Henkel management is, we're not going to sit here and wait to be ousted by an agency network."

Euro RSCG officially hasn't decided what to do yet, but agency sources say the balance is swinging from Henkel toward keeping P&G, also a $100 million account.

Agency sources say P&G refuses to remain in the same group as Henkel because of its conflict policy.

"We at Henkel are aware of the new situation of the Euro RSCG network," said Juergen Seidler, the manager responsible for the German detergent and cleanser business. "We have had many talks but nothing has been decided yet. However, a decision

Poll: Condom ads OK

Affiliates endorse network anti-disease spots

By Joe Mandese

Station managers affiliated with the Big 3 TV networks overwhelmingly believe condom commercials focusing on disease prevention should be accepted by the networks, according to an informal Advertising Age/Electronic Media poll.

But they're opposed to condom spots promoting contraception.

The poll was taken among station managers in the top 50 markets and conducted with the assistance of the Info-Edge Media Network, an electronic information management and communications company.

While 85% of the 27 station managers responding to the fax survey said they think their network should accept disease-related spots, 82% said they shouldn't accept condom spots focusing on contraception. The survey was sent to 170 station managers, with 16% replying.

The survey was conducted in response to Fox Broadcasting Co.'s decision last week to start accepting condom commercials that focus on disease prevention. The other networks currently prohibit any condom spots.

However, the Big 3 allow their owned & operated stations to air condom spots locally, based on their own assessment of local community standards on the topic.

Of the stations responding to the survey, 15% said they had aired condom spots locally.

NBC stations appeared to be most progressive on the topic, with 30% of the NBC respondents saying they had aired condom spots locally. Only 11% of the ABC respondents said they had aired condom spots locally, while none of the CBS stations said they had done so.

"This issue came up several years ago. A number of stations did agree to take condom ads in terms of disease prevention. A few spots were produced, and since that time, I am unaware of any requests for time for this product," said Dow Smith, VP-general manager of NBC affiliate WVTM, Birmingham, Ala.

He said he couldn't recall ever being approached to run a condom commercial on his station.

"I don't know what all the fuss is. It looks like a publicity effort by Fox," Mr. Smith said.

"We accept advertising for legal products, provided it is in good taste," said Gil Buettner VP-general manager for CBS affiliate

Meredith, CBS offer package deal

Involves local spots, promotions

By Scott Donaton and Joe Mandese

Meredith Corp. and CBS Television Stations have formed a cross-media ad sales alliance, the latest in a flurry of marketing partnerships that link print and TV.

The companies plan to pitch packages that combine national advertising in Meredith magazines, spot TV buys on CBS-owned stations and local promotions.

"It makes a very powerful combination," said William Murphy, director of Meredith Custom Marketing. "Suddenly, we're in the business of localizing major national advertising efforts."

CBS operates stations in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia and Miami, which together reach just under 25% of U.S. TV households.

Meredith publishes 13 consumer magazines, including Better Homes & Gardens, Ladies' Home Journal and Metropolitan Home. The media company also owns seven TV stations, including CBS affiliates in Syracuse, N.Y., and Bay City, Mich.

While the exclusive deal is initially limited to CBS-owned stations, there's an option to expand to the national network.

Meredith, among the more aggressive media companies in the area of integrated marketing, also has exclusive marketing alliances with Washington Post Co.'s Newsweek and Actmedia.

Those partners will be able to participate in the Meredith-CBS deal. Actmedia in particular will play a role in developing and implementing local in-store promotions.

For example, the partners could develop a program for a food company that would include ads in Meredith magazines and the publication of a custom cookbook with recipes using the marketer's product, said Phil Press, VP-sales and marketing for the CBS-owned stations.

Meredith could then publish sponsored recipe booklets to be distributed in supermarkets and promoted by local TV spots.

If advertisers want to expand the programs, other CBS affiliates and Meredith-owned stations could be added on an ad hoc basis through spot-TV rep companies, Mr. Press said.

The station group was approached by other publishers interested in forming similar alliances, Mr. Press said. But Meredith's women's and home service titles fit well with CBS' programming, which skews more heavily toward women than the other broadcast networks, he said.

The deal is believed to be the first formal alliance between a publisher and a major broadcast network.

Meredith itself tried to put together packages linking its magazines and TV stations several years ago, but the effort collapsed after Meredith sold its MMT Sales rep company.

Meredith and CBS Television Stations will start making presentations to ad agencies and marketers in the coming weeks.

Agency media buyers said it's difficult to determine the value of the alliance now.

"I'm intrigued by it and a little puzzled by it at the same time," said Joseph Ostrow, New York-based exec VP-worldwide media director of Foote, Cone & Belding.

"The idea's a good one if they can do it, but it seems much more natural to have the CBS network and Meredith," he said. "It would be awfully coincidental if [an advertiser] in Meredith just happened to need the CBS markets to heavy up. I don't know what's so magical about the CBS [owned & operated] markets."

"Conceptually, it brings some new opportunities to us," said Abbie Auerbach, senior VP-director of local broadcast for Ogilvy & Mather. "The implementation and the actual use of it and how it fits our needs have yet to be determined." □

Rival spots cluttering TV

By Joe Mandese

Competitive clutter within a single prime-time hour is emerging as a problem for network TV advertisers.

Two out of every five commercials in the average Big 3 prime-time hour face at least one direct competitor's message, an Advertising Age analysis of a week of prime-time commercial data found.

Of the 57 commercials that ran in an average prime-time hour, 24, or 42%, faced at least one competitor.

The findings are significant because research shows TV ad effectiveness plummets when a rival's spots are present.

"The advertising industry tends to look at the issue of overall clutter, when the important issue is what kind of clutter it is," said Robert Kent, a marketing professor at Drexel University, Philadelphia. Mr. Kent has conducted several studies on the effects of competitive clutter.

Based on a 1989 study he conducted among University of Cincinnati undergraduates, Mr. Kent said exposure to two competitive commercials decreased brand name recall by more than 25% and ad claim recall by roughly 40%.

"That's a bigger effect than I expected to see," he said. "It suggests that rather than looking at general clutter levels, the levels of competitive clutter are a more significant issue."

Mr. Kent recently monitored an episode of ABC's half-hour prime-time series "Coach" and found competitive spots for three cars, two light beers and two feminine hygiene products, plus eight other, non-competitive spots.

According to Ad Age's analysis of logs from Arbitron's Broadcast Advertisers Reports for the week of Oct. 14 to 20, NBC was the most competitively cluttered network. Nine, or half of the 18 spots during NBC's average prime-time hour, faced a direct competitor.

While CBS had the lowest level of competitive spots scheduled per average hour—38%—it had the most commercials overall per average hour, 21.

About 39% of the 18 commercials in ABC's average prime-time hour faced a competitor.

The BAR data reported only network spots, not local commercials, so the number of competitive messages could actually be higher. Since local stations are strapped for local and national spot revenues, they rarely turn away competitors' commercials for high-demand categories, particularly automotive, currently the most cluttered category.

The networks generally provide competitive protection within a commercial pod to advertisers that buy 30 seconds or more in the pod, but the protection doesn't extend beyond that period.

The monitored week's most competitively cluttered hour was during CBS' World Series coverage from 9 p.m. to 10 p.m. (ET) Oct. 20. During that hour, 67% of the 24 spots were competitive, including seven automotive, three computer, two financial services, two cold/cough products and two telecommunications corporate spots. The week's least competitive hour came during NBC's "Sisters" between 10 p.m. and 11 p.m. Oct. 19. None of the 14 commercials faced a competitor.

Such swings aren't unusual because competitors, seeking the same demographic targets, gravitate toward the same shows, said Arnie Semsky, exec VP-worldwide media director at BBDO Worldwide, New York. Also, some categories spend more during specific seasons, he noted. □

JWT wins $50M PM biz

By Dagmar Mussey and Judann Dagnoli

Philip Morris Cos. subsidiary Jacobs Suchard last week moved as much as $50 million in European coffee business to J. Walter Thompson Co. from Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising.

The move of the Suchard coffee brands, acquired by Philip Morris in September 1990, was expected since Saatchi isn't a core Philip Morris shop.

But the switch unexpectedly included two Kraft General Foods International coffee brands, Kaffee Hag and Kenco in the U.K., both previously handled by Young & Rubicam, with a combined $5 million to $10 million in billings.

The realignment gives Kraft General Foods three core coffee agencies: Y&R, JWT and Ogilvy & Mather.

The moves involved five coffee brands in Germany, Switzerland and Austria, and followed Kraft General Foods' shifting of $150 million in U.S. business last year when it created a broad incentive-based compensation system.

The switch also raised questions about O&M's hold on the $60 million-plus Maxwell House account in the U.S., prompting rumors the domestic account would also go to JWT, O&M's sister within WPP Group.

Maxwell House President Charles Phillips denied that speculation.

"Frankly, if we were to move the [U.S.] business, it would not go to Thompson," Mr. Phillips said.

He also said Maxwell House is "very happy" with O&M's work.

O&M has had the account since winning it back in October 1990—after losing it in May 1989—but only recently broke its first TV spot, a montage of old creative.

The decision to pull out of Saatchi was made by Philip Morris executives in New York and wasn't greeted enthusiastically by Suchard, said Albert Freese, general manager of Suchard's coffee business in Bremen, Germany.

Mr. Freese said the account shift was a "forced marriage."

But a source at the domestic company said the decision was made not by Philip Morris but by Kraft General Foods as part of the realignment.

The primary work on the realignment is spearheaded by Kraft General Foods corporate VP-Marketing Eric Strobel.

JWT is no stranger to the account, having lost Suchard's coffee business to Saatchi three years ago.

Saatchi's Frankfurt office is the big loser, having handled $25 million of the European account. Saatchi agencies in Austria and Switzerland lost the rest of the business. □

Business-flier bonus

TWA club to lure higher-paying travelers

By Jennifer Lawrence

Trans World Airlines this week plans to introduce a business-flier bonus club to boost its share of higher-paying passengers.

The Business Saver Bonus Club will award points toward items including refundable tickets, vacation packages, cruises, hotel stays, car rentals and dining. Points worth $15 toward those items will be awarded for every $100 spent on TWA's Business Saver fares, non-stop coast-to-coast flights and trans-Atlantic travel.

Reduced fares from coast-to-coast and to Europe will accompany the club's introduction.

Passengers will be offered first-class seats for coach prices on those routes; business-class service to Europe for a coach fare; and upgrades on low-end Business Saver fares with the TWA frequent-flier gold card or similar cards from competing airlines.

Introductory advertising is estimated at $3 million to $5 million via Avrett, Free & Ginsberg, New York.

A newspaper ad breaking Nov. 20 is headlined: "The greatest awards for the business traveler since frequent flier miles." Copy says: "The only club that pays you to join."

A 30-second TV spot is expected to air by the end of the week on the East and West coasts. A radio :60 is also part of the mix, and outdoor advertising may follow.

"We honestly feel that it's about time business travelers stop supporting the low-end leisure traveler," said Sheldon Kravitz, TWA VP-advertising/consumer marketing. "Because of our cost-efficiencies, we can pass along our savings to the business traveler. This program is a long-term strategy."

S. Kravitz

TWA's promotion comes as the entire airline industry is struggling. The nation's No. 7 carrier is hoping to win business travelers with unrestricted low fares on long-haul flights.

"This is a creative marketing approach, but fundamentally it will not do what TWA wants it to do," said Daniel Kasper, director of transportation practice at Harbridge House, a consultancy. "It won't save TWA, and it will almost certainly be matched."

TWA's Mr. Kravitz, however, said the new program can't be matched quickly or easily, since it involves issuing members a credit-type card for use at travel-related companies participating in the award program.

Separately TWA in the next two weeks plans to break a TV and print campaign for leisure travel to Europe. □

Men (finally) beginning to redefine roles

By Susan Hayward

The new edition of the Yankelovich Monitor reveals that after three decades of redefinition of the roles and goals of American women, there are signs that a similar transformation may have begun among men.

Since the early years of the women's lib movement, women have changed not only their own lives but also the functioning of most of the major institutions of American society. They have moved beyond their position of housewives and mothers and into the workplace, politics and other previously male-dominated areas. In fact, the intensity of the response to the Thomas/Hill controversy and the broad attention paid to it suggest that the unique point of view of women has begun to compete successfully in arenas of thought such as politics and law historically defined by the male experience.

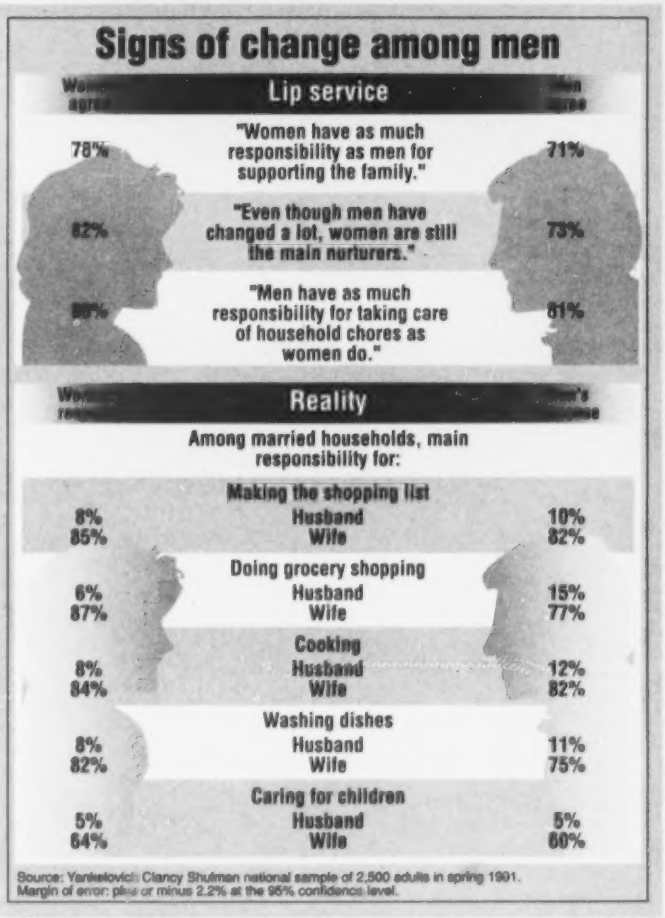
While women were reshaping their lives, they attempted to convince, coerce or even force men to make complementary changes, to become more "sensitive," cooperative and especially more equal partners in households tasks. They apparently believed that if women assumed (nearly) half the burden of income production (men's work), then men would be willing to shoulder some share of women's work in the home.

Men responded to the changes in the social and family environments in a variety of ways, ranging from ridicule to genuine efforts to help. But with no incentive and little real pressure to change, most men have not assumed major responsibility for any part of the work traditionally assigned to women. They help, when asked, but don't assume full responsibility, and they admit it.

Around 1985, women faced reality: They are responsible for the maintenance of home and family, they will have to maintain paid employment and men are not likely to fulfill their fantasy of the perfect mate. Recognizing the impossibility of the fantasy of the perfume ad ("Bring home the bacon, fry it up in the pan and never, never let him forget he's a man") they began to streamline the list of tasks for which they could accept responsibility. One of the casualties may have been women's support of traditional, stereotypical male myths.

Until this year, men operated under the guidelines of self-definition, expectation and responsibility in force since the 1950s or before: man as breadwinner, head of household, responsible for the well-being and protection of wife and children. In 1991 there is evidence, reinforced by the recent focus books defining the problems faced by male consciousness-raising sessions (often accompanied by drumming), that men may be feeling somewhat uncomfortable with the stereotypes. Census data suggest that almost one-third of single men between ages 24 and 34 are still living at home, perhaps because they have no clear idea of what comes next.

The Yankelovich Monitor data suggest that men may be experimenting with new roles, interests and self-images. In several areas, men and womem appear to be exchanging traditional positions. Men are becoming more interested in personal appearance (chest development, hair coloring, fashion), in romance and fantasy, in rituals and tradition. They are less likely to focus on the importance of money and of family and less likely to feel responsible for providing for the needs of others. The direction of women's interests is in each case the reverse of men's, leading to the conclusion that men and women may be, however temporarily, changing places. Women seem to become more practical and results-oriented, while men are moving in the direction of self-absorption and dependency.



JOHN SMITHER

While the outcome of these changes is not yet clear, it appears that men may have begun the same kind of odyssey of redefinition that women have been living through for decades. While this may create some confusion and turmoil in the near term, it augurs well for the longer term as movement toward a future social system in which men and women are again in agreement about the nature of their partnership. □

Who needs planners?

A good researcher should know creative

By Louis Cohen

In recent Advertising Age articles, two account planners, George Creel and Rob White, and a researcher, Erich Rupprecht, discussed planning and advertising research and gave their views on the relationship between the two.

However, they didn't attempt to answer what is to me the $64,000 question: Why does the advertising researcher need the planner, a third party, to translate research findings to creative?

Indeed, that advertising researchers need planners to translate for them has always seemed to me to be damning evidence of a major problem in advertising research. If researchers can't understand creative well enough to communicate with them, how can they do rich advertising research that comes up with insights and ideas that creative finds valuable in developing advertising?

I believe that in order for advertising researchers to come up with rich input for creative, they need to develop their own ability to plan. They need to be able to utilize their research findings to come up with advertising ideas for creative.

I think that most of us have been around a really strong advertising researcher, someone whose research and analysis could be counted on to come up with ideas that creative loved. Invariably, the strong advertising researcher is someone who understands advertising as well as research. Practically by definition, a strong advertising researcher is also a good planner. As the song goes, "You can't have one without the other."

How can advertising agencies carry out the goal of developing advertising researchers who have planning ability?

1) Expect researchers to understand advertising and how it is developed.

2) Offer seminars to help researchers learn how advertising is developed, so they can learn to translate research findings into ideas for creative.

3) Offer advertising researchers seminars on how to use clues from copy research and other sources to find out specifically what is not working in the advertising and, thus, what needs to be fixed. Creative needs to know this.

This should prove to be an excellent start toward "plugging in" advertising research to the advertising development process at the agency. □

SALARY OUTLOOK

Gender gap, 'right-sizing' add to pessimism for '92

By R. Craig Endicott

Even though employees at advertising agencies and their clients expect 7.6% growth in salaries, to an average $58,651 in 1992, they don't seem to be cheering.

The buying power of ad industry salaries continues to flatten as the recession nears the two-year mark, and "right-sizing," a new euphemism for scaling down to a lean-and-mean efficiency, is making more people spend longer hours at work and toil harder for less pay, according to Advertising Age's first annual salary survey.

The survey, which drew 493 responses from agency and client personnel to a questionnaire printed in Ad Age, also found a gaping gender gap in which men on average earn 1.6 times more than women at essentially the same tasks, a chasm that in time may narrow now that more women are in the marketplace.

That gap will narrow in 1992 if the respondents get the pay increases anticipated: men by 7% to an average $71,037, and women by 9.1% to an average $45,167.

The survey also found that moving to another job—perceived as the best way to increase pay by most respondents—did just the opposite. The 16% of the respondents who made a job switch since 1990 did show an increase in salary, but not at the growth rate of those staying put.

The ever-present recession is taking the optimism out of the client side.

In the last two years client personnel have been more positive about their ability to maintain their standard of living than have agency personnel. Now, about half the client respondents believe their standard of living will not rise in 1992—virtually matching the response from agencies.

Should this more pessimistic view reflect corporate ad spending, agencies that live off that spending may be in for continued tough times.

Gender gap's key barometer

The gender gap's most telltale evidence is salary level. Men maintain a huge lead in salary, making about $25,000 more on average than their female counterparts.

Among men in advertising, there is little difference between agency and client pay. The profiles are virtual clones: The average age of men in agencies and clients is 39; average years in the field is 13, the past four years in the current post.

Burnett takes employment lead

But number of jobs overall at agencies on the decline

By R. Craig Endicott

Fortified with new account gains worth a potential $300 million in billings in 1991, Leo Burnett USA exploded past Young & Rubicam to become the nation's largest agency employer with a head count of 2,429, up 9.8% from October 1990.

Employment at Y&R-named shops slid 8.8% in the same period to 2,316 to rank No. 2. Y&R and its subsidiaries remain the leader on a consolidated basis at 4,473, down 8.7%, according to Advertising Age's annual survey of the Top 10 agency employers.

Y&R, joined by four other employers in the Top 10 with work force declines, influenced a drop in total employment for the group of 0.6% to 19,719. This occurred as national media spending fell a precipitous 7.1% in first-half 1991 over the prior-year period, according to LNA/Arbitron.

The Top 10, however, outpaced the rest of the ad community, which dipped 4.7% in employment to 161,500 in September 1991 from the prior-year period, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics (see chart on Page S-20).

Since the first of the year, agencies have lost 3,900 employees nationally as total national media spending has declined $1.4 billion from previous year levels.

The national employment decline also boosted the Top 10's percentage of the nation's agency work force to 14.4%, compared with 13.9% a year ago.

The economic slowdown is hitting most agencies in much the same manner. Agencies have responded with layoffs, reduced or eliminated bonuses and increased work loads, according to a study by the League of Advertising Agencies, an association of small shops.

"Client attitudes are changing, too," says league President Joseph M. Dietz. "They're more concerned with how little they can pay an agency than about the value-added [services] we can provide."

Growth in employment in 1992 does not bode well for the industry.

"We're going [into 1992] planning for the worst and hoping for the best," says Stone Roberts, chief operating officer of Lintas:New York. His agency showed a 4.7% decline to 1,367 in finishing 12th. BBDO and Ogilvy & Mather also had employment declines to 1,546 and 1,342, respectively, to rank No. 11 and No. 13.

Current employees also can't count on the magnitude of year-end perks of past years because profit levels have declined across the board. At Foote, Cone & Belding, bonuses and profit-sharing contribution will suffer because profits are down for the first three quarters, notes Paul Sollitto, the agency's VP-corporate director human resources.

While overall employment is down slightly, he says, FCB shops in Chicago and San Francisco remain stronger than offices in New York or Los Angeles.

Burnett reports it will not kick in the traditional 15% to profit sharing, only the second time since 1943 it hasn't met the maximum payment. Despite new-client gains, Jack Kraft, vice chairman-

Looking out for the long term

'Base pay' continues to decrease as part of total compensation

By Laurie Freeman

When Lisa Fortini-Campbell first entered the advertising industry, she worked at Leo Burnett Co. as an assistant research analyst. Her compensation was a salary and a year-end bonus—nothing complicated to figure out.

By the time she left the industry in May 1990 after serving as senior VP-general manager of the Chicago office of Hal Riney & Partners, Ms. Fortini-Campbell's compensation included a base salary, an optional bonus and a profit-sharing plan with a required vesting period.

As she moved up the ranks, Ms. Fortini-Campbell, now a visiting associate professor at Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism's integrated marketing program, says more of her compensation became "less assured." She never was sure what she'd end up with at the end of the year.

For many agency and client-side executives, there's growing uncertainty about how compensation will be awarded in the coming decade.

Although the shift toward linking the pay of employees—from the ceo into middle management—to the long-term success of the company is more prevalent on the client side, there are indications such performance-oriented pay also will play a larger role in agencies, according to industry compensation experts.

"Companies are putting more pay at risk in both short-term incentives, like bonuses, and long-term incentive plans," says Jim Woodrum, executive compensation consultant at Hewitt Associates. "Short-term incentive plans are moving further down the management ranks. Long-term incentives like stock options also are becoming available to broader groups of employees."

According to a Hewitt Associates compensation trends study, base salary comprised only 30% of an average executive's total pay package in 1991, compared with 43% in 1983. One-third of a senior manager's compensation in 1991 came from long-term incentive arrangements compared with only 19% in 1983, according to the study.

Companies like PepsiCo, Waste Management Corp. and Merck & Co. are using various "results-sharing" programs, such as stock options, performance plans and restricted stock, to compensate employees outside of raising base salaries.

These programs reward employees based on some measure of performance, like productivity or profitability and must be re-earned each year, says Mr. Woodrum.

The downside is that the programs do not permanently increase total cash compensation (see story on Page S-10). Because of their potential payoff, they also serve to keep a lid on base pay.

Besides possibly providing greater financial security, results sharing also may keep key employees around longer because of time requirements connected to the collection of benefits. Meanwhile, the company benefits because employees with a vested interest are presumed to work harder to boost corporate performance and company contributions to their benefits accounts.

Recently, WPP Group began to put together an incentive compensation package to reward top managers for long-term performance. Such incentives, which would give agency employees a bigger stake in the London-based

Inside Interpublic labyrinth

The many facets of a compensation package

Corporate compensation packages may be putting more executive-level pay at risk, but the degree of risk can be minimal.

That's the case at Interpublic Group of Cos., which generally has shown consistent growth over the years.

But in 1990, the company's profit growth slowed from the prior year. Incentive pay dropped, leaving the top executives with less cash compensation than in 1989.

Philip Geier Jr., chairman, president and ceo, for example, experienced a drop of 4.3% in cash compensation to $1.64 million from 1989.

But despite the decline, he wasn't out any cash, because according to the Interpublic proxy statement, Mr. Geier was awarded $1.53 million in cash from the company's long-term performance incentive plan, compared with $306,612 from the same plan in 1989.

According to the Interpublic compensation plan (see accompanying graphic), Mr. Geier's cash compensation included $875,000 base pay, up $145,000, or 19.9%, from the prior year. But other pay—much of it tied to the company's growth rate and largely consisting of bonus and incentive pay—dropped $215,000, or 22%.

But not included in the cash compensation were the long-term performance incentives. Interpublic awards key executives "performance units" every two years. The value of some units is tied to pre-established growth rate objectives over a period of four calendar years. Other units are tied to the market or book value of Interpublic's common stock.

"Phantom" shares of common stock are divvied out according to the number of performance units held by each executive. Dividends are paid annually on these shares, an amount reaching $186,000 in 1990 for Mr. Geier. Outright cash awards, based on an assigned value of each performance unit, are made annually and are payments in excess of total cash compensation.

As in most corporations, the benefits for top executives hardly end with cash compensation and in the case of Interpublic, phantom payments.

Beyond straight salary and phantom payments, Interpublic contributed $9,414 as its portion to Mr. Geier's 401(K) plan and about $13,000 for his supplementary insurance; awarded him 8,039 shares of common stock under the long-term performance plan; supplied personal financial planning and tax-advice services valued at about $3,800; and provided an $18,000 annual retainer for serving as a director and $2,000 annually for each committee on which he serves.

Then there are the post-Interpublic awards: $160,000 per year in special retirement benefits after the age of 60, and the same amount for beneficiaries for 15 years should he die while employed by Interpublic.

Upon retirement, he and top agency executives will receive an average of $108,963 annually. □

Less perky, more practical

Perquisites are taking a back seat as greater portions of executive compensation are being placed at risk in the form of incentive arrangements at leading U.S. corporations.

Perks also have become less lavish and more practical, the most common being physical examinations, company cars, club memberships and financial counseling services (see chart below), although in the last five years even these near "compulsory perks" have thinned out, according a survey by Hewitt Associates.

Fewer companies are offering a broad panoply of perks. For example, the number of companies offering the most common perks —first-class air travel, airline VIP clubs, company plane, spouse travel, company car, club membership, executive dining room, home use of WATS hot line—has dropped by 6 to 10 percentage points in the five-year period.

The perk showing the greatest growth was communications equipment, a category dominated by the ubiquitous car phone that has grown from no respondents in 1987 to 37% of the companies in 1991, although only 0.4% of salaried exempt employees are eligible, according to the survey.

Corporate loans as a perk also began to expand into the work force, according to the five-year study. Five years ago, only 1.4% of a surveyed company's salaried exempt employees were eligible. This year, 5.4% can draw from the corporate loan pool.

The value of this perk was greatly diminished by the Tax Reform Act of 1986, which now requires executives to claim as income the difference between the low corporate rate and the existing market rate for an similar loan.

In lieu of perks, executives are being rewarded increasingly by long-term incentive plans that include stock options, performance plans and restricted stock. This portion of the total compensation package has risen from 19% in 1983 to 35% in 1991. □ holding company's success, may include stock options and performance bonuses.

At Interpublic Group of Cos., incentive compensation arrangements, such as the ones being investigated by WPP Group, have been a fact of life for top executives for more than 10 years, notes Kent Kroeber, senior VP-human resources at Interpublic.

These arrangements, in which about 1,500 of Interpublic's 16,000 employees worldwide participate, "create a capital earnings opportunity" based on the performance of the individual, the agency and the holding company.

"Depending on [those factors] the opportunity for earnings is greatly enhanced," Mr. Kroeber says. "We measure performance not on an annual basis but longer-term. And what you find after a while is that a greater proportion of compensation is incentive-driven as compared to base salary."

The Interpublic stock-ownership plan, once the sole province of the very top executives, has moved recently into the VP level.

Through various other programs, incentive payments at Interpublic can more than double an executive's annual compensation, Mr. Kroeber says.

By offering additional carrots, incentive compensation programs let employers control base salary expenditures for the executive cadre.

"I don't have to pay outlandish base salaries, like they do at WPP Group, where they have no incentives and they have to pay outlandish base salaries in both good years and bad," Mr. Kroeber chides.

The down side for the employee is that if the company has a bad year, the money for incentives is not there. "But you have to look at the long term, not just one year," Mr. Kroeber stresses.

It's that down side to incentive compensation that makes many industry executives leery of results-sharing programs, especially in down periods like the current media recession.

Industry headhunters are finding that in today's economy, not many senior-level agency executives are willing to gamble with their base salaries or their deferred compensation plans.

"In these bad economic times, what we all need is the ready dollar to live on," says Susan Friedman, president of her own New York shop that recruits creatives for ad agencies. "The dark side is you don't have your hands on the money today."

For instance, with profit-sharing plans, employees must stay with a company for five to seven years to realize the full benefit of the plan. Stock options are not ready cash. They must be purchased at a stipulated price during a specified period of time.

Too often in the agency business, an employee may be out the door, whether as a result of account losses or cost-cutting measures, before becoming vested or eligible to take advantage of any of the incentive programs. That's compensation that could have been included in the base salary.

"There isn't an agency president today who wouldn't like to wave a magic wand and have a lower salary base with the promise of dramatic bonuses," adds Don Gilbert, partner at Gilbert, Farlie, which specializes in agency compensation.

"There are agencies that have traditionally operated that way, with bonuses a dramatic percentage of base salary," he says. "But it's really hard for an agency to convert employees into low salaries, high bonuses based on merit or agency performance."

Bonuses are perhaps the most favored short-term incentive to improve executive performance. At Leo Burnett USA, bonuses are paid annually, with the amount determined by factors such as seniority and occupational position, says Jack Kraft, vice chairman-finance and administration.

In theory, a bonus is a discretionary expense. "It's not a locked-in, fixed expense like salaries," says Dick Corelitz, exec VP-director of finance and administration at Bayer Bess Vanderwarker, Chicago.

As results-sharing compensation arrangements move further into the management ranks, it behooves agency employees to pay more attention to how the compensation programs work.

"It seems more agencies are positioning a bonus to justify a lower than market-value salary," notes Ms. Fortini-Campbell. "So you're very much betting on the income, and that's harder for people to plan their lives. It depends on you staying beyond the 10 years that's the average tenure in this industry, and on your agency doing well, which is generally out of the control of any single individual." □

Unsaddled from perk, exec horses around

Andy Ray is now letting British Rail do the driving.

For want of a perk, Andy Ray got a horse.

Mr. Ray, a 28-year-old senior copywriter at Foote, Cone & Belding, London, lost his corporate car earlier this year when FCB eliminated the perk in a budget-cutting move (see accompanying story).

He may have lost his Mazda MX5, but he got A Nymph Too Far. That's a 2-year-old filly—a thoroughbred racehorse bought as part of a syndicate with the monthly "travel" allowance FCB installed as compensation for the reclaimed car.

"I don't ride her," jokes Mr. Ray, whose interest in the Nymph is purely sporting. "I'm too heavy, anyway."

Now British Rail zips him to work, cutting through traffic-snarled London and giving at least one horse lover a chance to catch the postings of a lost perk from the tracks at Bath to Hamilton to Brighton . . . and to dream about the big time.

FCB bucks U.K. tradition in eliminating company car

By Elena Bowes

Eliminate company cars!" came the collective cry from Foote, Cone & Belding administrators earlier this year when cost-cutting measures dipped into that most prized of British corporate perks.

The company car for years has been considered a given, not a perk, by U.K. advertising and marketing companies, which grant such privileges deep into the corporate structure. Company cars comprised 52% of all new car sales in 1990, according to the U.K. Department of Transport.

But the recession, which is forcing the industry to cut compensation rather than heads, and a new corporate tax hike on the private use of business cars are forcing employers to rethink the time-honored tradition.

A phase-out of the car perk would put British companies squarely on the trend path of their U.S. counterparts.

U.S. companies have been cutting just about all transportation-related incentives for the corporate elite in the past five years while giving increasing importance to long-term incentives, stock options and performance plans. Unlike the British, few U.S. companies have awarded the car perk below the top 1% of the corporate structure (see chart on Page S-10).

FCB's move will save the agency $425,000 annually. That's the difference between $1.02 million—the cost of depreciation, financing, insurance, gas, parking, maintenance and the 1.5 employees managing the fleet—and the $595,000 the agency is now spending on monthly travel allowances as compensation.

"We felt compelled to offer the allowance," says Chris Whitworth, group finance director, "because cars in a company like ours are really part of the remuneration. Taking them away without pay would be equivalent to cutting salaries."

While no other major agency has dared to eliminate the perk, many are trading down or holding onto their fleets longer.

Ogilvy & Mather has extended the lease on its company cars from three to four years. Other agencies have offered employees a cash incentive to downgrade to cheaper models.

"The Porsches and Ferraris have disappeared," says Morgan Johnson, executive director at Grey Communications Group in London. "Now you're seeing large family saloons [station wagons]."

"In the old days people could be far more arrogant about their position. If someone really wanted a [Fiat] Spider, the employer could do it. But now the stick is in the [employer's] hand, not the [job] candidate's," notes Steve Ingham, director of marketing of London recruitment company Michael Page Marketing.

"We've got our hands tied in metal," says Tim Lindsay, the London-based joint managing director of Young & Rubicam, referring to agencies in general. "Every company finance director is looking at the marginal benefit of the company car."

While advertising and marketing execs may be driving fewer sports cars to the office, their take-home pay has not suffered similar cutbacks.

According to Mike Walsh, chairman of Ogilvy & Mather in the U.K., "There's a demand for good people. I don't think salaries in advertising have gone down."

Abetting the budget freeze is reduced employment. The advertising industry has shrunk 13.3% in the last two years from 15,900 employees in 1989 to an expected 13,800 this year, according to the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising, a U.K. trade body.

Mr. Johnson of Grey estimates total industry compensation may have fallen by up to 10%, but individual salaries have either stayed constant or risen this year.

Bill Couldrey, managing director of Reward Group, a U.K. company specializing in remuneration, says U.K. marketing salaries have risen 9.9% from September 1990 to September 1991, compared with 10.7% for the previous 12 months. While this year's increase is smaller than last year's, inflation has plunged from 10.9% in 1990 to 4.1% today.

The top earners at Saatchi & Saatchi Co. and WPP Group, which both went through severe financial restructuring earlier this year, have taken massive salary cuts as a result of their companies' huge drops in profitability. WPP Group Chief Executive Martin Sorrell, Saatchi Chairman Maurice Saatchi, his brother Charles and Saatchi CEO Robert Louis-Dreyfus have each taken steep pay cuts.

The Saatchi brothers' have seen their salaries fall from $1 million a year each to $530,000 in two years, while Mr. Louis-Dreyfus renounced 40% of his salary, dropping it to $510,000. Mr. Sorrell has taken a more modest cut, from $1 million in 1989 to $862,000 in 1990.

O&M directors gave up their bonuses voluntarily last year, Mr. Walsh says. "People understand the reason we are doing this is . . . to avoid firing people."

O&M also has eliminated departments that don't affect client service, such as the typing pool and the personnel department. Its direct marketing arm, Primary Contact, gave its staff a week's unpaid vacation to save money.

Cutting corporate fat is not all bad news. According to FCB's Mr. Whitworth, several employees have used the monthly allowance they get in place of the company car to buy things prohibited in the old policy, including a Jaguar XJ5, an old MGB and a one-tenth of a racehorse. □

Working in France has a price to pay

Salaries lag, but media units show signs of improvement

By Bruce Crumley

Despite having raced past most other industry sectors in growth, profitability and international expansion in recent years, the ad community still finds itself tailing the typical French compensation pack.

The average agency head earns $122,000 annually, including perks, according to a recent Association of French Advertising Agencies study, far from the mean salary of $220,400 commanded by presidents of client companies.

Reasons for the salary disparity abound, according to industry observers. In advertising there is no union pressure to push up salaries as there is in the industrial sector; agency top executives remain founder/-managers and have directed profits back into growth rather than into their own salaries or staffers'.

Another reason for the disparity is the ad industry's Johnny-come-lately rise to respectability.

It took a while, but advertising is now considered a marketing imperative, leading to the total integration of the ad community into French life: from the marketing of President Francois Mitterrand—the task of Euro RSCG's Jacques Seguela—to Eurocom's Andre Azoulay overseeing the privatization of investment bank Paribas.

The study also indicates a high degree of egalitarianism in the agency structure, disclosing average salaries of creative directors of $119,140, and $117,000 for international ad directors.

J. Bille

The survey of 3,571 employees of 49 French agencies, however, found that 12 agency executives in the corner office were paid more than $205,000.

Although AFAA would not say who the top earners were, it noted the larger Paris-based agencies were more profitable and better-placed to offer higher packages than smaller shops in Paris or the larger agencies in the provinces.

"The average upper-level salaries are less consequential than we thought . . . given the impressive growth of advertising over the past five or six years," says Jacques Bille, AFAA VP.

According to the association, ad spending in France during the last seven years nearly doubled, from $6.5 billion in 1984 to $12.6 billion in 1990 for an annual growth that averaged 11.7%.

In the last three years of this period, the ad industry advanced from 12% in 1988 to 11.5% to 8% in 1990, but the average salary increased only 6%, 5% and 3%, respectively. In France as elsewhere, salaries gen-

IF YOU THOUGHT GREAT BEACHES WERE TAMPA BAY'S ONLY DRAW . . .

You've been out in the sun too long.

While miles of unspoiled beaches and near-perfect weather have made Tampa Bay a popular tourist destination, the area offers much more than sun and sand.

One of the nation's fastest-growing metro areas, Tampa Bay has now become Florida's #1 metro in population, #1 in households, #1 in effective buying income, and #1 in retail sales. In the past year alone, Coca-Cola Refreshments Co., and Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. announced plans to locate new operations in the Tampa area.

So it's not surprising that younger people keep moving to Tampa Bay — population has been growing by 125 people every day through the last decade.

And it's not surprising either that Tampa Bay keeps up with the Times. The St. Petersburg Times, Tampa Bay's largest newspaper, beats The Tampa Tribune in metro circulation by more than 106,000 papers daily and 122,500 on Sunday.

So catch the new wave of growth in Tampa Bay. Call 1-800-333-7505, ext. 8249, for your copy of the 1992 Life and Times of Tampa Bay, containing the latest information on the thriving Tampa Bay market and the newspaper that serves it best.

If salaries are topic, then vitriol spills out

Survey respondents get emotional as they decry unpaid overtime, lousy raises

A survey about that most personal of subjects—salaries—is bound to provoke a highly emotional response.

While most of the returns to the Advertising Age Salary Survey questionnaire were quickly dispatched by the respondents, a number of returns contained some heart-felt emotion.

Heavy, paper-tearing pencil strokes—especially from those in the $20,000-$30,000 salary range—spoke of the anguish and resentment over past, present and future salary levels.

Others left nothing to the imagination. They scribbled comments in the margins. A sampling of condensed comments from the field follows:

"Company won't pay overtime, now or ever, but will pay secretaries O.T. because they are non-exempt salaries."

"No raises in '92 because 70 people were laid off between Dec. '89 and May '91, but the media director in his position less than a year insisted on a newly furnished office. Cost estimate? $100,000-plus."

"I'm not sure I want more money. What I'd really like is less stress, less hours. Of course, more money would also be nice . . ."

"They doubled my work, increased my hours. I gave up home and social life. Was the salary increase worth it? NO!"

This response was penned on a sheet of note paper headlined: "The Career Woman's checklist for success . . ." with trailing copy, "Look like a lady; act like a man; work like a dog."

"All salaries frozen this year."

"Laid off???"

This was offered as a response to a question asking what salary was expected in 1992.

"Pretty good for Austin, Texas," wrote a senior account executive about the $36,000 in salary received this year.

"You should correlate $ with a question on whether people are happier."

Although respondents weren't asked to identify their employers, one wrote, "Why hide it? It's JWT/Detroit where they pay media planners little more than secretaries."

Peter Kuper/The Image Bank

While margin scribblers are more likely to be disgruntled than satisfied employees, one reader crafted a response that was almost painful to read, but one that's probably not that uncommon in this time of high unemployment in a contracting industry.

The edited text follows, detailing the trials of trying to make it in the ad business:

"When I was in college, I never really knew what I wanted to do. I went there to learn about the world, not train for a career.

"As time passed, I found out about public relations and advertising; both of which were thought of as hot areas. Glamor jobs.

"There was intense competition among advertising and public relations majors.

"I chose to earn a liberal arts degree rather than specialize, thinking that I'd be able to go into PR and still get a classic education.

"Since graduation, I have worked my ass off for several bosses.

"You'd recognize the story: I started at $5 an hour to get some experience. I worked in media space sales in another job. Now I'm an account exec for a large PR firm in a large metropolitan city.

"It's a position many of my fellow students would envy. I am 'privileged' to work with media of all kinds, plan special events, create new-business presentations, etc., plus manage the agency's own PR and new-business efforts.

"I work 60 to 75 hours per week. Until recently, I worked every weekend until my husband laid down the law.

"I am required to kiss the asses of clients, who in real life I wouldn't give the time of day. I've been told by my boss to work 15 hours a day if I have to 'because you're young' and 'can handle it.'

"Recently another account exec quit. He handled the advertising for our clients while I had handled the PR.

"I was required to assume his duties, too. Meanwhile, my boss took a vacation.

"Six weeks later he found a replacement. Why should he pay two people when I'm dumb enough to do the work of two for one low price?"

"The point is that I work like a slave and get no thanks, no rest, no help and no overtime pay.

"My salary, if you consider my hours, is little more than the $5 an hour I made two years ago.

"I have insomnia, I've gained 10 pounds, have no social life unless I attend a function for work, which is usually two or three nights a week.

"I wish I could go back to college and tell everyone advertising is not at all what it is cracked up to be. It's a sham. Maybe someone can tell me it's just my place of employment.

"And don't tell me to find another job. In this town, I'm envied because I even have a job. There are no other jobs.

"Do you have any idea what it's like to be taken advantage of? To make less than $20,000 a year in your mid-20s when you're intelligent, creative and making the company money?

"I denounce this profession. And I am looking for other work. Maybe teaching or working for a food shelter. Then maybe at least my $5 an hour will mean something."

Like discussing religion and politics, the issue of salary can unleash a wealth of pent-up emotions.

Editors on this project sulked for days after reviewing a form sent in by a media director in the mid-Atlantic states noting total compensation of $125,000 in 1991 and $200,000 expected in 1992. □ erally lag growth.

Also, as the marketplace has begun to contract due to the economy, there is a fear among agencies that clients will reduce expenditures and commissions. No agency wants to get too top-heavy in salary expenses under such conditions.

Mr. Bille notes that calculated into salary tallies are perks, from the company car to stock-option plans and performance pay. These have become an increasingly important factor in total compensation, although they remain a focus of top management.

On the whole, ad industry salaries have risen 8% to 9% from 1990 to 1991 for a real growth of about 6% given the 2% to 3% inflation rate, says AFAA, although it expects agencies to scale back payouts in 1992.

The survey also showed women, who comprise more than 62% of the advertising work force, are paid less than men.

While women in some categories do earn more than men (over $2,400 annually as agency presidents), overall salaries are 7% less.

There are wide disparities within job groupings, however.

Among creative directors, women make 58.5% less than their male counterparts, and among development directors, 18.7% less.

> "Average upper-level salaries are less consequential than we thought given the impressive growth of advertising over the past five or six years."

Within the French agency business there have been bastions of accelerated salary growth—particularly in shops' media departments.

"Ten years ago, a media director in Britain would have been paid much more than one in France because the role was less crucial in the French market," Mr. Bille says. "Today, a media director would be paid about the same in both countries."

The challenge that independent media wholesalers like Carat Espace have posed by competing for lucrative media budgets has caused agencies to develop their media planning and buying divisions more quickly over the last decade, according to Mr. Bille. Carat has lured many top agency media executives with larger salaries, leading to an inflation of salaries in the media departments at agencies.

Media departments still constitute a small part of French agencies' overall compensation, claiming 8.8% of total salaries. Some 8.6% of France's agency personnel reside in the media department, compared with 31% of agency personnel in client services, which draws 33% of the total pay.

"It is obvious that salary growth next year will be less than in recent years, and maybe even flat in real terms," Mr. Bille says. "In fact, we were surprised that salary increases last year had already begun to slow." He attributes the slowdown to planning for the effects of a war following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. □ ity is that women respondents have been working fewer years and in their current jobs for less time than male respondents. Women respondents average 33 years of age, have been in their field an average of eight years and spent the last three in their current post.

Unlike the mirror effect between men at agencies and clients, women on the advertiser side make a noticeably higher salary than those in agencies. Women employed by clients are paid an average $44,325. They expect $47,478 in 1992, compared with agency women who receive an average $38,487 and expect $41,047 next year.

The gender gap isn't as big a factor when the subject is job satisfaction. Here the gulf exists between agency and client employees.

Among men, 64% of client-side respondents believe their standard of living increased since 1989, compared with 56% of men in agencies. More agency men believe they are working harder for less pay—54% vs. 48% of client employees.

Both groups of male employees are equally pessimistic about 1992, however. Only 44% of both groups believe their standard of living will rise in 1992.

The opinions of women at agencies track client women in virtually the same manner. About 68% of client women see their standard of living increasing since 1989, compared with 58% of agency women.

The gaps between the sexes return in ratings the attractiveness of benefits.

When asked to identify three benefits they deem most important, men put more stock in the annual bonus and stock options than women. Women assigned high marks to those benefits, too, but showed more interest than men in pension, flex time, overtime, compensatory time, leave of absence and childcare.

Total responses to the survey were split between women and men. Few job titles seemed a bastion of any gender, except several higher administrative posts (ceo, president, et al.). The numbers in this sector were not so high (29 men vs. 20 women surveyed) that they did not compromise the data.

Billings drop brings down employment

Agency and total advertising employment, and national measured ad spending by quarter administration and finance, explains the cut by noting existing clients are spending less. He expects the year to be flat in the U.S. with $2 billion in billings.

Burnett takes job lead

But in explaining the huge increase in staffing at Burnett, he claims, "We have more work than ever, even though clients are spending less. We refuse to lower the quality of the product [by cutting staff]. If you're building an Olds and not a Yugo you don't start building a cheaper car."

Mr. Kraft says Burnett is "dipping into profits to pay for the buildup . . . which we can do because we're not paying off heavy debt or appeasing stockholders. This may or may not contribute to new business in 1992."

"Our clients face a reluctant consumer," says Joseph E. De Deo, president-ceo at Young & Rubicam. "We anticipated some of this at the beginning of the year," he says, "and made cuts through attrition and by offering early retirement."

He says 1991 will go down as a bad year. It defied predictability, he claims.

"We thought things would return to normalcy after the Persian Gulf War, but they didn't . . . then we expected a turn-up in the fourth quarter. That is not going to happen. We're holding a conservative attitude toward 1992," Mr. De Deo says.

So, too, is Lintas, which has discovered traditional advertising is being short-circuited by sales promotion and direct response, two short-term marketing services, which for Lintas feed into its integrated marketing services.

But despite new client gains at Lintas, only one client came in over forecast this year—Lego Systems. "In the past two years we've learned that budgets [levels] don't end up as the ones started with," says Mr. Roberts.

since 1989, while only 16% say it didn't and 21% note no change.

Of the large segment that saw an increase in standard of living, 60% expect that pattern to continue in 1992; 33% anticipate no growth; and 7% predict a decline in their '92 standard of living.

Of the 16% who say their standard of living decreased the past three years, nearly three out of four believe their standard of living will either decline further or experience no change in 1992.

The salary level of this 16% is currently at an average $54,680, down from $55,799 in 1990. The data suggest that a barrier of sorts is present in the low-to-mid-$50,000 range, the salary breaking point between corporate climbers and the rank and file.

For those who perceive their standard of living on the rise, their salaries have risen from an average $50,223 in 1990 to $54,585 in 1991, to an anticipated $59,549 in 1992.

There is a hint of job dissatisfaction filtering through the data among those whose standard of living is not on the upswing. More than three-fourths of that group feel they worked harder for less pay in 1990 and 1991 and 60% of them are putting in longer hours than the previous year.

Conversely, of those whose standard of living is on the upswing, they seem less harried. Only 60% of them are not working harder vs. 38% who are, and 50% are not working longer hours vs. 48% who are. The rest see no change in their hours.

Regardless of movement in standard of living, just about 60% of all respondents believe the fastest way to increase salary is to move to another company.

Is the grass really greener?

About 16% of all respondents, in fact, changed jobs since 1990. More women than men see a job change as breathing new life in their salaries, but fewer took the plunge since 1990—16% of women, compared with 17% of men surveyed.

But contrary to popular belief, changing jobs does not bring the boon in anticipated salary growth.

Average salaries of men changing jobs rose 4% to $50,097 in 1991. By contrast, the average salary increase for all men was 7.6%. Those men changing jobs also tend to be on the lower end of the pay scale, because the average salary for a male respondent was $66,373 in 1991.

The same holds true for women changing jobs. Their salaries after the switch rose 3% to $38,310, compared with a salary increase of 4% to $41,408 for all women respondents.

Average age of job-changers was 37 for men and 31 for women. The men have been in advertising/marketing an average of 11 years vs. six for women.

The most active job market was in the West South Central states (Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Arkansas) where 25% of regional respondents changed jobs since '90.

The Southeast, from West Virginia to Florida, ranked second at 19.7%. The Midwest, basically north and east of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, ranked third in job changes at 19.2%. It is not known if the job moves were inside or outside the region.

Regional pay varies

Of the five dominant ad regions surrounding hubs—New York-Philadelphia, Chicago-Detroit, Dallas, Atlanta and Los Angeles-San Francisco—the New York-Philadelphia region led in salary size, averaging $58,700 in 1991 and an anticipated $61,200 in 1992.

That compares with an average $48,000 in 1991 and an expected $52,200 in 1992 for the Midwest region dominated by Chicago, and a current $54,900 and anticipated $60,900 on the West Coast.

Advertising professionals in all regions have doubts their standard of living can keep pace with levels enjoyed in 1989 through 1991. In the New York-Philadelphia region, for example, 62% of respondents say their standard of living increased since 1989. But only 45% believe their standard of living will improve in 1992, and 53% see either a decrease or no change even with salary increases. This pattern is universal.

Survey nuggets

- 93% of respondents are Caucasian, not including a Hispanic 2%; 3% are black and 1% Asian.
- Average salary is $54,526 in 1991, with $58,651 expected in 1992; not included in salary is an average bonus of $10,022 in 1991 and average pension contribution of $4,832.
- Of 493 total respondents, 235 are from agencies, 246 from clients and the remainder not identified.
- Among clients, advertising titles drew the second-largest number of responses, the most popular title being ad manager at an average pay of $50,021 for men and $35,101 for women.
- About 59% of respondents view changing jobs as the quickest way to increase income; 17% believe staying put can do the same trick; 12% see changing fields a better solution "to getting ahead" than leaving or staying.
- 16% of respondents have changed jobs since 1990.
- The New York-Philadelphia region drew the most responses—23.5% of the sample—closely followed by the Midwest (largely Chicago), 21.1%; and the West Coast, 13.6%.
- The benefits identified as among the more important by men and women respondents were low-cost health insurance (26.2% of respondents), pension (17.5%), annual bonus (17.4%) and profit sharing (11.4%). □

Blacks reveal TV loyalty

MEDIA WORKS

While overall ratings for the Big 3 networks continue to decline, a BBDO Worldwide analysis of data from Nielsen Media Research shows that blacks in the U.S. are watching network TV in record numbers.

"Television Viewing Among Blacks" shows that TV viewing within black households is 48% higher than all other households. In 1990, black households viewed an average 69.8 hours of TV a week. Non-black households watched an average 47.1 hours.

The three highest-rated prime-time series among black audiences are "A Different World," "The Cosby Show" and "Fresh Prince of Bel Air," Nielsen said. All are on NBC and all feature blacks.

"Advertisers and marketers are mainly concerned with age and income, and not race," said Doug Alligood, VP-special markets at BBDO, New York. "Advertisers and marketers target shows that have a broader appeal and can generate a large viewing audience."

Mr. Alligood said this can have significant implications for general-market advertisers that also need to reach blacks.

"If you are running a general ad campaign, you will underdeliver black consumers," he said. "If you can offset that delivery with those shows that they watch heavily, you will get a small composition vs. the overall audience."

Hit shows—such as ABC's "Roseanne" and CBS' "Murphy Brown" and "Designing Women"—had lower ratings with black audiences than with the general population because "there is very little recognition that blacks exist" in those shows.

"This turns off black viewers who want to see a world that acknowledges blacks, even if they are not the star," he said.

A network show won't be successful unless it also attracts a large black audience, said Ken Smikle, president of the African American Marketing & Media Association, an organization of black-owned ad agencies and communications companies.

"The more advertisers are interested in reaching this audience, the more networks and independent stations will be interested in delivering this audience," he said. □

MEDIA STRATEGY: HONDA

ABC, Honda revive cast commercial

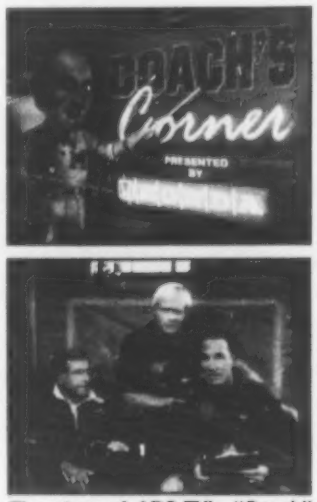
Details on the media strategy of a recent campaign.

Cast commercials are coming back to TV, years after casts of prime-time shows like "The Beverly Hillbillies" would sit down to breakfast and eat a bowl of Kellogg's Corn Flakes.

While the networks have been integrating advertisers' plugs into their program promotions for about a year, none involved pitches from stars of a network series. Until now.

Starting last month and running through yearend, ABC is using "Coach" star Craig T. Nelson to plug American Honda Motor Co. in an integrated program/product promotion called "Coach's Corner."

The 30-second spots air Monday night at the end of ABC's "MacGyver," leading into "NFL Monday Night Football," and show Mr. Nelson and co-star Jerry Van Dyke bantering about the upcoming game. The segment is followed by a 15-second Honda commercial and a tagline delivered by Mr. Nelson that alludes to Honda.



The stars of ABC-TV's "Coach" pitch for Honda in a comeback for cast commercials.

The initial flight carried a public safety spot with Honda highlighting airbags. Mr. Nelson follows the spot, saying, "Don't forget to buckle your seat belt." In other spots that feature specific Honda models, Mr. Nelson says, "Stick with No. 1."

The promotion is a value-added element to Honda's sponsorship of "Coach," with Honda paying standard rates for the :15.

The deal works on several levels, said Chuck Bachrach, senior VP-director of national programming and purchasing at Honda agency Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles. It promotes "Coach" for ABC, gives Honda an "island of programming that sets it apart from the sea of surrounding automotive ads" and lets Honda reach the desirable "Monday Night Football" audience.

"We couldn't get into 'Monday Night Football' because we were already blocked out by other automotives that had bought the category exclusively," Mr. Bachrach said. "This gave us an opportunity to reach male viewers and hopefully get some of the lead-in viewers to 'Monday Night Football.' " □

News briefs on print, electronic and alternative media.

Paperless trail. Group W Satellite Communications has developed an electronic system that takes much of the paperwork out of cable TV buys. The service, dubbed Traffic & Sales Service System, currently is being used by TNN: The Nashville Network and CMT: Country Music Television and has been licensed by the Monitor Channel. Regional sports cable network Home Team Sports plans to start using it next month. The service, which is similar to competing systems being used by Turner Broadcasting Systems and USA Network, electronically generates sales proposals, contracts and audience performance reports.

A slice of pay-per-view. Pizza Hut will tie into Viewer's Choice's Dec. 4 pay-per-view event, "The Judds: Their Final Concert," with a local promotion in San Diego. Four of the local cable systems carrying the event in the San Diego area will offer a $5 discount off the pay-per-view concert to all customers who order a pizza delivery from Pizza Hut for three weeks leading up to the event.

Black radio merger. Sheridan Broadcasting Networks and NBN Broadcasting, two leading black-owned radio networks, merged Oct. 25. The new company consists of National Black Network, Sheridan Broadcasting Network, STRZ Entertainment Network, SBN Sports Network and SPM Radio Network.

Cruising. The February issue of YM, will include the debut of a first-person column from Hollywood heartthrob Tom Cruise. Mr. Cruise will contribute to the magazine for the next four issues. The issue will also feature a 12-page pullout booklet highlighting how various celebrities do their hair. The closing date is Nov. 22. A b&w page is $15,835 and a color page is $24,710.

Pizza Hut will team with Viewer's Choice for The Judds' farewell concert.

Columbus, y'all. TNN: The Nashville Network on Jan. 20 will launch a 38-week, ad-supported campaign celebrating the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' first voyage to the New World. The campaign, titled "TNN Explores America," will include sponsored contests, promotions and special telecasts.

Oprah expands. Oprah Winfrey's Harpo Productions will produce all four of ABC's "Afterschool Specials" next season. The specials include a documentary and two reality programs hosted by Ms. Winfrey. The last of the four specials will be based on a yet-to-be announced concept submitted by a teen-ager through a contest sponsored by ABC in conjunction with Seventeen. In addition to the four Harpo productions, Ms. Winfrey will introduce repeats of "Afterschool Specials."

A super move. After 37 years of letterpress printing, DC Comics will switch to offset starting the week of Jan. 14. DC, which publishes comic books featuring Superman, Batman and other classic characters, will also move to a whiter stock that will produce more vibrant colors.

"The new books will be printed with 85-line screen, an improvement over the old 65-line screen. We'll be able to do bleeds for the first time," said Production Director Bob Rozakis.

Going public. New York public TV station WNET, Channel 13, has restructured its marketing department and begun an aggressive campaign to court corporate budgets that traditionally would go to commercial media outlets. The station has launched a newsletter titled Thirteen & Company and is now making regular sales calls on ad agencies and clients for national corporate underwriting sponsorships. □

Promotions get boost

Survey finds higher spending plans for '92

By Scott Hume

The prospects for 1992 spending on sales promotion programs are good, but that may not be reflected in promotion agency billings.

Of 50 U.S. and Canadian marketers surveyed last month for the Council of Sales Promotion Agencies, 64% said their approved plans for 1992 call for higher total sales promotion budgets than in 1991. Another 28% said next year's budget will be the same as this year, and 8% said the sales promotion budget will be lower.

Among those that set higher budgets for 1992, 60% said spending will involve the same types of programs or tactics used this year. Among marketers that plan new programs, the most commonly mentioned were direct marketing and local promotions or events.

But the increased spending for direct and event marketing won't necessarily be billed through sales promotion agencies.

The 50 companies surveyed were asked which promotion expenses are billed through promotion agencies. Display/point-of-purchase work is billed through agencies by 58% of responding companies; fulfillment by 50%; event marketing by 48%; printing by 46%; direct marketing and premium purchasing each by 44%; and promotional media, including media buying, by 38%.

Those percentages suggest agencies can best increase billings growth by expanding capabilities in areas such as direct marketing and media buying.

The marketers seemed to be interested in increasing their promotion agencies' level of involvement. Asked whether in 1992 they plan to get their promotion agencies involved in new areas, 48% said yes. Another 42% said no, and 10% are undecided.

Among those that said yes, most said they will look for help with strategic planning, followed by trade promotion, direct marketing and meeting planning.

Three-quarters of respondents said no promotional programs have been canceled for 1992 or moved to a different area within their companies. Free standing inserts represented the most frequently mentioned canceled program.

The survey was conducted by Waldman, Moore, & Associates. The companies, surveyed by telephone Oct. 1, represent 29 business categories and are all served by CSPA member agencies. □

What's not spent at sales pro shops

While spending on sales promotion may rise, billings by sales promotion agencies don't necessarily rise accordingly. The CSPA survey asked 50 client companies to list areas of promotion expenditures that aren't billed through their sales promotion agencies. Only 14% of respondents said they bill promotional spending through promotion agencies.

Lotus drops destruction oath

By Alan Radding

Lotus Development Corp. has backed down from a promotion that brought new meaning to "guerilla marketing."

The in-store discount promotion for its 1-2-3 spreadsheet software began early this month but backfired when customers objected to Lotus' requirement that they destroy copies of competing software products.

To get a discount, customers had to bring in the title page from the manual for Microsoft Corp. or Borland International's spreadsheet. Customers then were asked to sign a form promising to destroy their copies of Microsoft's Excel or Borland's Quattro Pro within 90 days.

After a flurry of complaints, Lotus changed the promotion.

"We now require the customer to install the program on the same computer as the current spreadsheet," enabling users to run each program, a Lotus spokesman said.

The policy change will be communicated directly to software retailers; new pledge cards are being printed.

Lotus started its first in-store discount upgrade promotion in September 1990, countering a Borland promotion that offered a discounted copy of Quattro Pro if customers proved ownership of Lotus' 1-2-3.

Lotus then offered a deeply discounted advanced version of 1-2-3 in-store to customers who proved ownership of 1-2-3 and promised to replace the old version with the new. The goal was to discourage customers from passing along the old copy to a new user.

By automatically extending the same requirements to a promotion involving competing products, Lotus forced customers who wanted to use both products into technically violating the software license agreement.

While it's unlikely Lotus would have taken legal action against individual users not destroying competitors' products, software publishers have taken a hard line on piracy by large corporate customers.

Spreadsheet software discounting has been rampant for two years as Borland and Microsoft chip away at 1-2-3's share, now about 50% of unit sales, down from 70% in 1989.

Borland and Microsoft continue to target Lotus customers with aggressive price promotions. Borland is running a promotion themed "One, Two, Free," offering buyers of Quattro Pro or Paradox database programs two of three other Borland products free.

Microsoft is offering 1-2-3 customers an upgrade to the latest version of Excel, available in-store or by phone.

Lotus handles promotions in-house; Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, handles advertising.

Borland does promotions and advertising in-house; Ogilvy & Mather, San Francisco, is Microsoft's agency. □

TV nets warming to condom ads

By Pat Sloan and Joe Mandese

Condom marketers are quickly rejiggering their ad plans to include TV following Fox Broadcasting Co.'s decision to accept condom commercials.

The scramble follows basketball star Earvin "Magic" Johnson's announcement he tested positive for HIV.

Fox last week said it will break with tradition and accept condom commercials that focus on disease prevention. The network already has been approached by at least two, unidentified marketers and is reviewing their commercials, said Andi Sporkin, VP-publicity and public relations.

While CBS and NBC said they will review their policies prohibiting such spots, ABC said it will still prohibit them. Local affiliates of the Big 3 have run condom spots.

Carter-Wallace, the No. 1 condom marketer, will consider TV, a spokeswoman said. The company wouldn't comment further.

Schmid Laboratories, marketer of Ramses, Sheik and Protex prophylactics, said it plans to air on Fox "The Gift," a 30-second spot for its Ramses Extra brand. The commercial first ran on local New York stations in 1987. Schmid President Ken Matthews said he couldn't give an airdate.

Schmid, the No. 2 player in the U.S. market, also said it plans to bring its Ramses Safe Play youth brand to the U.S. from the U.K. early next year and will advertise the brand on Fox.

"We're in the process of producing a spot for a [Safe Play] campaign," said C.J. Key, president of Key Concepts, the San Francisco marketing company working with Schmid on the introduction.

Mr. Matthews said Safe Play is scheduled to ship to retailers by February; he wouldn't disclose the introductory ad budget. McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, is Schmid's agency.

Besides TV, Safe Play will be supported by print and radio ads, sampling and couponing, and will be the sponsor of the "MTV College Tour: Sex in the '90s."

Meanwhile, No. 3 Ansell-Americas may resurrect a campaign for its LifeStyles brand that first ran in 1986.

CYNTHIA WATSON

Themed "I'll do a lot for love, but I'm not ready to die for it," the :30 was created by then Della Femina, Travisano & Partners, New York.

Ansell is also breaking a disease prevention print campaign in December magazines via current agency Koenig & Associates, Shrewsbury, N.J.

Marie Kraemer, LifeStyles product manager, said Ansell is considering airing the 1986 campaign on Fox.

The company is also considering TV and radio versions of its new print campaign, which uses copy such as "An ounce of prevention because there is no cure," "It was only once" and "Sexually transmitted diseases foiled again," Ms. Kraemer said.

Both the 1986 LifeStyles commercial and "The Gift" were part of a wave of commercials that followed former Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's recommendation that condoms be used to prevent AIDS.

The LifeStyles spot made sex a life and death issue, while the Ramses commercial promoted parental involvement.

In "The Gift," created by then Ogilvy & Mather unit Euramerica International, a father writes to his son in college, warning him of herpes and AIDS, and encloses a Ramses condom.

While Schmid Laboratories hasn't yet produced a Safe Play spot, it's toying with three concepts, one of which is shown here (l.) in animatic form. LifeStyles (top) minces no words in its pitch.

Della Femina resigned the LifeStyles account in 1987 after Time quoted an Ansell executive as saying, "AIDS is a condom marketer's dream."

Now, condom marketers may again face criticism.

"What fascinates me is that there has been all this media attention on condom commercials but no one can figure out why no condom commercials were being offered," Fox's Ms. Sporkin said. "This is the first time in two years that we've been approached about a condom commercial."

In fact, condom marketers in the past have resisted heavily investing in U.S. TV commercial production because of the limited outlets available, and the time and programming limitations set by stations that accepted them.

Further, sales haven't warranted megabudgets, with most marketers holding annual measured media spending to the $3 million range.

Schmid, for instance, will spend $10 million on advertising and promotion this year, but 70% of that will be spent outside measured media.

According to industry estimates, the annual growth rate of the U.S. condom market is 3% to 5% compared with 7% worldwide. Some countries such as Canada, with more liberal advertising policies, have posted growth rates of as much as 10%.

Mick Maroney, general manager of Update USA, a consulting and publishing company that specializes in consumer healthcare, predicted any upward sales blip now will also be short-lived.

He also said the fear of appearing to be trying to capitalize on the AIDS issue may prevent some companies such as Johnson & Johnson from entering the U.S. market.

"They tried once before and are now keeping an eye on it," he said. "But even if they are interested, I'm sure they would not like the timing now."

J&J had no comment. □

Johnson plans for future ads

By Gary Levin

A Washington, D.C., company that matches corporations with sports figures is discussing a deal with Burroughs-Wellcome Corp., marketer of the AZT AIDS-treatment drug, for Earvin "Magic" Johnson to appear in public service spots urging testing for the virus.

Mr. Johnson, the basketball star who shocked the world by disclosing he tested positive for HIV, is setting up a foundation that will determine where money from endorsement deals will go and, presumably, what kinds of projects he will consider.

Stephen Disson, president of D&F Consulting, is handling the negotiations for Burroughs-Wellcome, a client.

At this point, all Mr. Johnson has determined is that he wants to fund AIDS research, education and care, but no organizations have been identified as beneficiaries.

"We're still looking at the proper way to do this," said Lon Rosen of First Team Marketing, Mr. Johnson's agent. "That's still a couple of days away.

"All of his sponsors want to get involved, which makes us happy. But we need to take some time."

Converse said it will start a $1 million public service campaign by yearend on network TV and radio.

Themed "Magic's athletes against AIDS," the effort from Ingalls, Quinn & Johnson, Boston, will support education and research on the disease and will feature other Converse basketball endorsers. Mr. Johnson OK'd the effort.

E. Johnson

Converse President Gib Ford said Mr. Johnson will continue to appear in product advertising. Mr. Johnson's Converse contract extends through 1995.

Spalding Sports Worldwide will continue to market the Magic Johnson basketball and will seek the athlete's permission to issue promotional or commemorative items, profits from which would be donated to the foundation.

Mr. Johnson, whose contract extends through mid-1995, is paid royalties on sales of the basketballs in exchange for his endorsement.

Target Stores initially said it would pull TV spots featuring the athlete because they might be "too flippant" given the serious nature of his condition. But the discount chain decided to continue the effort from Chuck Ruhr Advertising, Minneapolis.

"We first questioned the appropriateness of the TV spot because of its humorous tone," John Pellegrine, senior VP-marketing, said in a statement. "We didn't want to appear insensitive or exploitative. However, Magic's agent has encouraged us to continue the campaign as planned."

Nestle Chocolate & Confection Co. may decide this week whether to air a new Nestle Crunch commercial. The spot, created by Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York, was scheduled to break in January.

"A lot of things are being considered," said Linda Gavlick, Nestle public relations manager.

"Nestle is interested in staying aboard," Mr. Rosen said last week.

Pepsi-Cola Co. last week said Mr. Johnson won't appear in an upcoming commercial because the basketball star asked to be excused from the shoot due to vacation plans.

Gary Gerdemann, Pepsi's public relations manager, said no decisions have been made regarding Mr. Johnson's future commercial appearances because the company hasn't yet met with him.

The news has hit overseas, too.

Campofrio, Spain's leading meat products marketer, put its entire 1992 marketing and ad strategy on hold until an new focus could be found. Mr. Johnson was the star of a $10 million marketing campaign created by Young & Rubicam, Madrid, slated to run through 1992.

The major marketers that have deals with Mr. Johnson currently provide him with about $12 million in annual income.

David Burns, president of Burns Celebrity Service, said few of the marketers will embrace social causes at the expense of product marketing.

"They're not going to spend any money digressing with this," he said.

Said Mr. Disson: "Their business is to sell their products . . . not to use him in a public service capacity." □

WWMT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Denver ABC affiliate KUSA accepts condom ads after 9 p.m., but there's been little action from condom marketers, said Joe Franzgrote, VP-general manager.

"There has been little money available in any event," Mr. Franzgrote said.

Fox revised its position about six months ago but was approached only recently by a marketer seeking to air a condom commercial, said Andi Sporkin, VP-publicity and public relations.

Ms. Sporkin said the network would air condom spots only after 9 p.m. (ET) and not in any family-oriented programming such as "The Simpsons."

"We have not been approached in two years about a condom commercial, but about six months ago we began re-evaluating our position on it, assuming we would be approached in the future," Ms. Sporkin said. "We decided that we are open to the idea of a condom commercial, but it really came down to the message that is in the commercial."

Schmid Laboratories recently approached Fox about running ads to introduce Safe Play, a new line of condoms targeted at teens and young adults. Schmid is the U.S. division of London International Group, which markets Ramses, Sheik and Fourex condoms.

While ads for Safe Play are still in development, Schmid may air previously produced spots for its Ramses line (see related story above).

CBS and NBC are reviewing their condom policies, while ABC said it doesn't plan any changes. □

Du Pont to slash marketing $46M

WILMINGTON, Del.—Du Pont said it will eliminate at least $46 million in advertising, public relations and associated communications costs by the end of 1992. It's part of an overall plan to reduce corporate costs by $1 billion in the next one to two years. The communications cut will result in an initial consolidation of Du Pont's supplier list to less than 10 from 65 and a further consolidation early next year. Survivors so far include: Reese Tomases & Ellick and Lyons Inc., both here; BBDO Worldwide, New York; Young & Rubicam, Wilmington, Detroit and New York; Ketchum Communications, Philadelphia; Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide, Rochester, N.Y., and New York; and N W Ayer, New York.

Burnett's discount grab

Agency seeks magazine deals for group of advertisers

By Scott Donaton

Leo Burnett Co. wants magazine publishers to restructure traditional media buying practices by granting the agency volume discounts for a particular group of clients.

The controversial request is being met with stiff opposition by most publishers, who fear that such a plan would open up a "Pandora's box" of rate negotiation.

The Chicago-based agency has approached publishers of women's service, newsweekly and business titles in recent weeks, asking them to allow discounts based on the combined spending of a group of the agency's clients.

The Burnett plan would fundamentally alter media buying in the U.S., where the clout in media negotiations traditionally lies with the individual clients, not the agency.

Most publishers have not yet responded to the request, but many said they would reject it.

"We all play with fire, but this one is over the edge. It doesn't seem to be going over very well."

"We definitely will say no to them," said the publisher of a women's service magazine who asked not to be identified. "We all play with fire, but this one is over the edge. It doesn't seem to be going over very well."

A Burnett spokesman declined to confirm specifics of the plan, but sources close to the agency said Burnett has been exploring agency discounts and hasn't yet received feedback from publishers.

Agency discounts are common in Europe, where agencies and buying services purchase media time and space in bulk and then sell it to clients. Agencies with the most volume command the deepest discounts under that system.

The concept of agency discounts last surfaced in the U.S. in early 1990, when Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York—after being offered an agency discount by First for Women—broached the topic with its cli-

Texas unleashes new ad probes

By Jennifer Lawrence

The Texas attorney general's office is going after national advertisers with a barrage of investigations.

Signaling a broad-scale industry investigation of advertising aimed at underage drinkers, Texas Attorney General Dan Morales last week requested samples of 1991 advertising from six companies: Adolph Coors Co., Bacardi Imports, Jos. E. Seagram & Sons, Anheuser-Busch Cos., Heublein and Miller Brewing Co.

A Nov. 20 letter from Texas Assistant Attorney General Stephen Gardner asked the companies to provide the ads by Dec. 2 and to attend individual meetings in Dallas on the issue the week of Dec. 9.

In letters also dated Nov. 20, Mr. Gardner told NBC and four advertisers that bought time on its recent sports special, "Jock Spots," that his office is investigating the "connection between paid commercial time for a number of products and the placement of those products within the NBC's 'Jock Spots' program."

The investigation isn't limited to that one instance, the letter said.

The advertisers who received the letter are Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., Nike, Coca-Cola Co. and Sara Lee Corp.

Texas' multipronged attack makes it clear that states won't back away from regulating national advertising —even as federal agencies exercise more muscle and advertisers complain of having to answer to 50 states.

Until recently, the federal

Abortion ads to heat up election year

By Cleveland Horton

As the presidential election year approaches, the highly charged issue of abortion is becoming the subject of an increasing number of ad campaigns.

Although recent efforts have surrounded specific legislation, these campaigns offer a glimpse of the strategies proponents and opponents of abortion rights plan to follow. They also indicate the willingness of organizations on both sides to spend money on media blitzes to further their viewpoints.

With 435 congressional and 35 U.S. Senate seats up for grabs, along with a dozen governorships and many other state offices, the amount of abortion-related advertising is virtually guaranteed to grow.

Adding fuel to the fire, the U.S. Supreme Court is close to considering a case many expect could produce a decision overturning its landmark Roe vs. Wade decision, which struck down restrictive state abortion laws in 1973.

Last week in Michigan, the state chapter of Right to Life launched a statewide campaign supporting adoption as an alternative to abortion. The TV campaign is scheduled to run through mid-January on 18

Coke thinks regional in U.S.

GSD&M gets Texas ads; marketer may take bye on Bowl

By Alison Fahey and Jennifer Lawrence

As Coca-Cola USA gears up for its first global ad campaign, the soft-drink marketer is retooling its U.S. marketing and media strategies.

Underscoring a new emphasis on regional marketing, Coca-Cola recently tapped GSD&M, Austin, Texas, to create advertising for Coca-Cola Classic in Texas.

In another unusual move, Coca-Cola is considering sitting on the sidelines during the upcoming Super Bowl XXVI.

GSD&M, a $150 million shop, was awarded the estimated $10 million Texas account. It's unclear whether Coca-Cola considered other agencies, including McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, longtime agency of record for Coca-Cola Classic.

The move appears to be yet another blow to McCann, which operates Houston and Dallas offices.

In September, Coca-Cola named Creative Artists Agency its "worldwide media and com. unications consultant," sparking speculation that McCann's role in the company's marketing efforts was diminishing.

"We are stepping up our emphasis and involvement in local activity."

"We are stepping up our emphasis and involvement in local activity, and we will be using local media and events where possible to accomplish this," M. Douglas Ivester, Coca-Cola Co. senior VP and president of Coca-Cola USA, told analysts last week in Atlanta.

One insider called the Texas effort, which may start as early as next spring, "a huge Texas initiative for Coke Classic and maybe other products." GSD&M couldn't be reached for comment.

Olympic test for CBS

New teams must sell remaining inventory

By Joe Mandese

The first test of a new sales structure for CBS will be selling the remaining slots in the network's 1992 Winter Olympics programming.

In shifting Dec. 1 to an account team approach from a traditional daypart sales system, CBS is under the gun to sell the rest of its Olympics inventory.

With less than three months before the Games start airing on Feb. 8, about 15% of the inventory remains unsold. That 15% will be the hardest to sell because it's unlikely advertisers coming in this late would commit to full category sponsorships.

Those sponsorships, which can cost as much as $50 million, are usually bought well in advance to build on heavy pre-Olympics marketing programs.

Key categories still unsold include fast-food and financial services. CBS was also unable to sell half of the beer category to Miller Brewing Co., which only bought one-third. Anheuser-Busch had already purchased the other half.

Sold categories include airline (Delta Air Lines and United Airlines); computer (Apple Computer); telecommunications (AT&T Co. and US Sprint); and import car (American Honda Motor Co. and Subaru of America). There have been substantial buys from the U.S. Army and Bugle Boy Industries.

CBS will have to sell the remaining inventory based on straight media value, which will be difficult in the current network marketplace.

"That will be our first-quarter mission," said Senior VP-Sales Joseph Abruzzese, who called the new structure the "perfect way" to sell the inventory.

Under the system, sales executives can cross-sell any daypart they want. Previously, moving across dayparts required going higher up the sales ladder.

Currently, first-quarter costs per thousand for prime-time inventory on the Big 3 networks average about $7.50, half the prime-time Olympics CPM of $15.

To help preserve Olympics rates, CBS is expected to heavily package that inventory with other dayparts, primarily prime time and other first-quarter sports, including the National Football League playoffs, Super Bowl and the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball championship tournament.

For example, CBS recently cut an estimated $10 million first-quarter deal with Merrill Lynch & Co. for a buy that includes the Super Bowl and Olympics.

The network also cut a small multiple-daypart/Olympics deal with Rubbermaid.

Those deals were straight media buys and don't include the marketing extras category sponsors get.

CBS is also expected to try to shift advertisers out of some heavily sold prime-time shows, including its hot Monday night schedule, into the Olympics. That would free up valuable inventory for other packages.

The network has very little first-quarter prime-time inventory because it was so heavily sold during the upfront selling season.

CBS' new sales system is timed to be in place well in advance of the 1992-93 upfront season.

The network will rely on five account teams to sell all dayparts. Each team will get two major agencies and a mix of smaller ones. Currently, account execs in each daypart call on a mix of agencies and clients.

Daypart managers still will set prices in each daypart, but Mr. Abruzzese said the account team leaders can depart from those guidelines to close important deals, providing they have a good rationale.

NBC is closely monitoring the new system's performance, but ABC's sales management has said it's opposed to such changes. □

Oh boy

Bugle Boy Industries' ad agency speaks for itself to young men about Bugle Boy colored denims in an eye-popping new campaign scheduled to break nationally this week on MTV: Music Television. The first in a series of four commercials created by DDB Needham Worldwide, Los Angeles, pairs steamy shots of scantily clad young women with a humorous message from the agency. The client, it says, "wanted to show a bunch of male models. We said showing nothing but beautiful women would work better." The commercial ends with the line: "We know what guys like."

McCaffrey seeks top creative exec

By Gary Levin

McCaffrey & McCall is under pressure to find a top creative director quickly as the agency fights to keep two of its largest accounts.

John Doig, 42, McCaffrey's deputy chairman and chief creative officer, last week said he will join Earle Palmer Brown Cos.' Bethesda, Md., office as exec VP-creative director.

Robert Cherins, chairman-ceo at McCaffrey, said Mr. Doig's departure was anticipated for several months and is unrelated to the review of Mercedes-Benz of North America's $100 million account or the $30 million Bacardi Imports review.

Mr. Cherins said he hopes to replace Mr. Doig soon. Just how soon that happens will have some bearing on the New York-based agency's ability to keep those accounts and win new business.

For example, the agency is competing with several other shops for Compaq Computer Corp.'s $30 million North American account, now at Ogilvy & Mather, Houston.

"The times are not ideal, but people still want to get into a situation like this with an equity opportunity," Mr. Cherins said. "There's healthy interest, and that's been surprising."

"Given the state of the economy now and the lack of jobs at that level . . . there are better people available than there were," said Judy Wald, president of the Judy

TV ads gaining favor worldwide

By Pat Sloan

NEW YORK—TV advertising is more highly regarded today by consumers than five years ago, according to a global research study released by BBDO Worldwide.

The study, based on phone and in-person interviews with more than 5,000 consumers ages 18 to 49 in 32 countries, showed 71% view advertising as better than it was five years ago, while only 8% think it's worse. The study, conducted in late 1990, measured attitudes toward TV advertising in general and in 13 specific product categories.

TV advertising also got high marks for entertainment and information value.

"Despite consumers' criticism and complaints, despite increased media clutter and despite the perception that advertising creativity has suffered in the wake of the megamergers of the 1980s, it seems that people around the world have very favorable attitudes toward TV advertising," said Karen Olshan, BBDO exec VP-director of research services.

Ms. Olshan acknowledged that the study found the greatest net attitudinal improvement among consumers in less developed countries and the least in more developed nations.

In Malaysia, for example, net improvement in the way advertising is perceived was more than 85%, while in the U.S. it was just 15%. Net improvement was calculated by deducting the number of respondents who felt advertising was worse from the number of those who felt it was better.

Of the product categories studied, BBDO found cola advertising to be the most popular worldwide with marks of excellent or good from 78% of respondents.

Automobile, beer and athletic shoe ads followed; at the bottom were bar soaps, household cleaners, gasoline, soup and, least favorite, headache remedies.

The study, also broken down by country, found that 70% of Americans see TV advertising as entertaining and 73% informative. The two negatives cited by Americans were "commercials often treat people as if they're not very smart" (81%) and "commercials often mislead consumers about products" (79%).

"This extremely positive general characterization of advertising . . . clearly indicates that even Americans are open to advertising—they are ready to listen and be entertained. It's up to advertisers and their agencies to captivate and motivate these consumers," Ms. Olshan said.

The study had an margin of error of plus or minus 1.2 percentage points on a worldwide basis and 6.6 within a specific country. □

HBO extends reach

Hungary, Latin America get pay channel

By Richard Bruner and Nancy Giges

Time Warner is expanding its Home Box Office pay cable channel beyond the U.S.

The company this fall entered Hungary in a partnership with US West and United International Holdings, launching HBO as the country's first pay entertainment channel.

GLOBAL NEWS

Time Warner owns 50% of the joint venture, Kabelkom, which plans to launch an ad-supported channel for cable systems next spring.

Also, Time Warner has entered Latin America in a 50-50 joint venture with Omnivision Latin-american Entertainment.

The Spanish-language service, HBO Ole, is airing throughout Latin America and the Caribbean.

"It was coincidental that the two services launched at about the same time," said June Winters, director of corporate affairs at HBO. "We've been investigating [foreign markets] for a long time. For the past two, two and a half years, we've been making quick progress. The world has changed, and that has helped to open up some doors."

HBO's interest outside the U.S. goes beyond pay channels.

"We are investigating every possibility and in lots of different markets," Ms. Winters said, adding that Asia and Southeast Asia are of special interest.

Time Warner is also looking at entering Czechoslovakia and Poland with HBO and has done a feasibility study in Czechoslovakia, said Robert M. Leighton, Kabelkom's Budapest-based managing director of programming.

The regulatory environment is more hospitable in Hungary than in other Eastern European countries, Mr. Leighton said.

Currently, HBO offers 6 hours of films, usually from 6:30 p.m. to 12:30 a.m. About half the movies are subtitled and half dubbed.

The second, ad-supported channel will probably start with 6 hours of entertainment programming, Mr. Leighton said. □

Theaters try 'videos'

By Barry Brown

TORONTO—Cineplex Odeon has found a way to benefit from the popularity of videocassette players.

The theater chain was about to close two movie complexes in Edmonton and Calgary, Alberta, because of low attendance when it decided to show second-run movies.

MOVIE

"Someone in publicity suggested we could piggyback on the video promotion," said Marci Davies, Cineplex's director of marketing.

Cineplex started the program, called Encore Cinema, in August in Edmonton and October in Calgary. This month, four complexes in Toronto were added.

The second-run films are timed to take advantage of the video releases' advertising and promotion, Ms. Davies said.

Radio spots and a promotion with The Toronto Sun, both handled in-house, supported the Toronto opening.

The theaters show such fare as "Silence of the Lambs" and "Thelma & Louise" for $1.60 in Toronto and 80¢ elsewhere.

The idea, Ms. Davies said, "is to get people out who did not see [the movie] and would rather enjoy it in a movie theater environment than pick up a video and watch it on TV."

The concept "has been a phenomenal success [in Edmonton and Calgary], and it's been building in Toronto as people hear about it," she said.

Because concession sales form a "much greater" share of the theaters' revenues than ticket sales, the discount prices have been a tremendous success in drawing moviegoers who then spend money on snack foods, she said.

Ms. Davies noted that discount movie houses are more common in the U.S., but she said she's "not aware of any plans to put Encore in the U.S. right now."

Cineplex plans to open another Encore in Edmonton by yearend. □

'Whore' video gets 2 versions

By Marcy Magiera

A film titled "Whore" might easily be shunted away in the corner video store's adult section. Add its NC-17 rating and that's almost a sure bet.

To avoid that death sentence, Vidmark Entertainment will release the controversial arthouse film in two R-rated video versions, one without the potentially offending title. Then it will try to appeal to parents by marketing "Whore" as the educational flip side to "Pretty Woman's" glamorized look at prostitution.

"Whore" stars actress Theresa Russell in the gritty story of a young single mother who becomes a prostitute to support herself and her child, then must escape her violent pimp. The movie, from Vidmark's Trimark Pictures, opened Oct. 4 and is still playing in a few theaters.

The video, which hits stores Jan. 22, will open with a public service announcement for Children of the Night, a non-profit group that helps teenage runaways.

In return, Lois Lee, director of Children of the Night, will appear on talk shows promoting "Whore" as a film parents should watch with their troubled teens.

To ensure its inclusion among mainstream movies on video store shelves, Vidmark will release "Whore" in two R-rated versions. One version will carry the original title; the other will have the same packaging but the title "Whore" will be replaced with "If you can't say it, just see it."

That was the tagline Trimark used in its movie marketing campaign this fall.

The title change was made "for some retailers who are sensitive," said David Bowers, Vidmark VP-public relations. Likewise, "the 'R' rating was needed so that people who wanted to see the movie, but don't feel comfortable renting an NC-17 [film], could see it," he said.

The company plans to spend $500,000 on a trade campaign to video retailers. It hasn't yet set plans for consumer advertising, Mr. Bowers said.

Vidmark creates its ads in-house. International Communications Group, Los Angeles, handles media buying.

Vidmark will also release "Whore" on video in its original NC-17 form, and a more explicit, unrated version. □

Social messages urged in product placements

By Marcy Magiera

The newly formed Entertainment Resources & Marketing Association is trying to polish the product placement industry's image by urging members to place positive social messages, along with leading brands, in movies and TV shows.

"We're going to be using our influence to talk up [social causes] with the creative people," said Frank Devaney, president of the association and senior VP at Rogers & Cowan, Burbank, Calif., a public relations and product placement company.

Association members such as Anheuser-Busch Entertainment Marketing are urging film and TV executives to incorporate responsible drinking messages in scenes where A-B products are used, he said.

All the association's 17 members will start to promote "social issues in general," such as safe sex and anti-gang messages in scenes where they're appropriate, Mr. Devaney said. For example, a waiting room set could be decorated with posters warning of the dangers of smoking or gang violence, instead of generic artwork.

The association was formed in September in an attempt to legitimize the product placement business. A-B and AT&T Co. are the only advertiser members; the rest are mainly product placement companies.

The group denies its formation was in response to a Federal Trade Commission investigation of product placement. The FTC began reviewing the practice in May at the request of the Center for the Study of Commercialism. □

Brands in trouble

Marketers say they want to return to brand-building in the package-goods industry. But consumers are tuning out ad messages and flocking to discount stores. Is Sam Walton's retailing vision a force for brand-building, or brand-bashing? See Page 16.

Retailers find good holiday media deals

By Kate Fitzgerald

Two major retailers are taking advantage of the soft fourth-quarter marketplace by buying media at discount rates.

Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Toys "R" Us say they've managed to increase their media presence this holiday season without stepping up their ad spending budgets, a move they hope will boost sales.

Mattel also said it's increased its TV advertising without fattening its budget, due to media buying bargains.

"The market's been soft like the economy, and it's worked in favor of retailers that are getting more frequency and effectiveness for their advertising dollars," said Allen Bohbot, president of Bohbot Communications, a New York-based toy media-buying company.

Giant toy retailer Toys "R" Us opened 50 new stores this year and managed to stretch its media plan to include several new markets without spending any more money, thanks to "more attractive" media buys, Mr. Bohbot said.

J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, handles the creative portion of the $20 million account.

Sears' holiday TV campaign will also be its "heaviest ever," said VP-Marketing Matt Howard, but the retailer won't spend more money than last year.

Sears is counting on new TV spots promoting its reliability to drive sales during the holidays.

Sears snared "excellent" electronic media buys for fourth-quarter advertising, said S. Scott Harding, Sears' national advertising manager.

Sears maximized the oppor-

Shoppers launch cautious holiday

An Ad Age Roundup

Big sales, low prices and contests were the reasons most shoppers hurried to the malls on Nov. 29 for the kickoff of the holiday selling season.

Retailers and consumers cited the bleak economy as the reason many people are holding off on purchases this year, except for items with marked-down prices.

But traffic was heavy at many stores touting sales, with the biggest crowds at discount outlets and strip malls with a high concentration of lower-price merchandise.

Many stores opened early Friday, and some reported brisk customer traffic for sales that ended before noon.

Kmart Corp. went one step further by opening its stores nationwide on Thanksgiving Day for the first time ever and advertising that fact in national newspapers. All other major retailers were closed that day.

The nation's No. 2 retailer successfully tested Thanksgiving Day hours in its Detroit-area stores last year.

Kmart officials weren't available to comment about the tactic's results, but individual store managers said customers

Kodak may hunt for 3rd agency

Film marketer focuses on global strategy

By Alison Fahey

ROCHESTER, N.Y.—Eastman Kodak Co. is restructuring its marketing communications department, and the move is expected to result in an agency roster change.

The restructuring will "allow us to take a more global approach to all our communications," said Richard Bartlett, Kodak's VP-director of communications for imaging. That may mean a third major worldwide agency could be added, he said.

"Part of that exercise is to look at our agencies," he said. "Our agency structure will have to change to mirror our new structure."

Kodak's current lead worldwide agencies are J. Walter Thompson Co., which handles film products, and Young & Rubicam, agency for camera advertising.

Mr. Bartlett said several scenarios are under consideration and the company is examining its agency situation "without any preconceived ideas."

"We could go to a consumer photography agency of record all over the world" for product or future corporate image advertising, he said.

"Would we consider a third agency down the line? Yes, I'm not ruling out anything," Mr. Bartlett said.

"We are very satisfied with the quality of both Y&R and JWT. . . . But as our business grows and segments, there may be an opportunity for another agency. . . . There could be an agency charged with Kodak brand enhancement globally.

"As we grow, our advertising expenditures will grow," Mr. Bartlett said. In 1990, Kodak spent $665 million on measured and unmeasured media in the

New product search

Campbell looks for growth in different areas

By Judann Dagnoli

Campbell Soup Co. is searching for new products, a hunt that could take the food marketer beyond its existing product categories.

"There has been a philosophy change, as instituted by [Chairman-CEO] David Johnson to look at new opportunities," said Campbell President Herb Baum.

The company will explore ways to move brand names established in one category, such as Prego spaghetti sauce, into related categories, such as bread crumbs and olive oil, Mr. Baum said.

"Earlier, we had stuck to what we knew best. But now, if someone has a good idea, we're talking about trying it," he said.

"There has been a philosophy change . . . to look at new opportunities."

Citing another example, Mr. Baum said a brand like Open Pit barbecue sauce could be extended into charcoal briquets. Or Great Starts, Campbell's frozen breakfast line, could be expanded into waffles, he said.

"We've just scratched the surface on Great Starts," Mr. Baum said.

As part of the initiative, the company will become more flexible in other ways, he said, such as experimenting with heavy spending tests for some of its lines.

Still, Campbell will be cautious in testing these new ideas and highly selective in how far it will stretch its cross-branding moves,

Clorox faces seizure

FDA seeks revised Take Heart dressing label

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—A senior Food & Drug Administration official indicated Friday that Clorox Co.'s Take Heart salad dressing could be seized if the company doesn't comply with an order to change its label.

The FDA's battle with Clorox began with a September letter to the company's president ordering several labeling changes for Take Heart, the company's successful entry in the low-fat, low-cholesterol dressing market.

After a meeting with the FDA, Clorox officials promised to make all but one of the revisions, said Gene Newberry, deputy director of the FDA's Division of Regulatory Guidance. He wouldn't identify the change Clorox refused to make.

But even after the meeting, Mr. Newberry said, Clorox was bound by the original letter to offer a written response to the ordered changes. Clorox hasn't yet offered that written response, he said.

On Nov. 27, Sandy Sullivan, Clorox's manager of marketing communications, declined comment on the FDA actions, saying it was "inappropriate" to respond since Clorox was in discussions with the agency.

"The ball's in our court, and at this point, we could either forget about it, seize the product or get an injunction," Mr. Newberry said.

"The ball's in our court, and at this point, we could either forget about it, seize the product or get an injunction."

Among the problems cited by the FDA were the placement on the Take Heart label of a heart with the term "heart healthy" flagged and "Take Heart" prominently displayed.

Those elements "cause these goods to be misbranded . . . because they represent and suggest that these products will provide a benefit to the heart when . . . total dietary pattern and overall weight control . . . is necessary to achieve a healthy heart."

The agency also said the statement "fat free" was misleading because the product "was formulated with partially hydrogenated soybean oil which is 100% fat" and the "cholesterol free" term on the label was misleading "because it implies that these products normally contain cholesterol."

The FDA also said the label's makeup and the typesize of labeling information violated federal regulations.

If the FDA opts for seizure, it would be the agency's first since its April confiscation of thousands of cases of Procter & Gamble Co.'s Citrus Hill Fresh Choice orange juice. The seizure came after repeated warnings to P&G to stop using "fresh" in the product's name since it was processed orange juice.

That seizure was enough to win the attention of other marketers who also had ignored FDA orders. Ragu Foods, Citrus World and others quickly agreed to similar FDA label-change orders. □

ActMedia company for sale

By Alison Fahey

ActMedia, the largest in-store marketing company in the U.S., is for sale, but the buyer also will have to acquire the parent company's six TV and 10 radio stations.

Debt-laden Heritage Media Corp. is exploring several "strategic options," including an outright sale of the company, but insisted its "crown jewel," ActMedia, won't be spun off.

Heritage, whose broadcast properties include TV and radio stations, recently hired Goldman, Sachs & Co. to "assist it in a review of strategic options . . . designed to maximize shareholder value," according to a statement.

"We would entertain a sale of the entire company but we would not under any circumstances [separately] sell ActMedia," said David Walthall, Heritage president. "The only way someone can own ActMedia is to buy the whole company."

ActMedia places ads in supermarket aisles, carts and on shelves.

Mr. Walthall said if Heritage sold off its broadcast assets and was left only with ActMedia, the company would then be taken public.

Another scenario Heritage would consider is bringing in a "strategic minority partner" with ActMedia.

Heritage was formed in 1987 by Chairman James Hoak who led a $225 million leveraged buyout of Heritage Communications' broadcast assets.

That transaction came as Heritage Communications merged its cable properties with Tele-Communications Inc., the cable TV company led by John Malone.

ActMedia was acquired in 1989 for about $180 million. Heritage also owns POP Radio Corp., which provides customized, ad-supported radio broadcasts to supermarkets.

At the end of 1989, Heritage had revenues of $165 million, operating cash flow of $37.9 million and long-term debt of about $282 million.

Heritage "is a highly leveraged company and Wall Street has said it doesn't like highly leveraged companies anymore," said Wayne LoCurto, ActMedia's president-ceo.

Heritage has a debt payment to TCI due in July 1994 for $125 million, he said.

But Mr. Walthall said the note could be refinanced, adding, "There are some financial opportunities that are available if someone had deeper pockets than us." □

Soviet TV sets first ad guidelines

By Betsy McKay

MOSCOW—Soviet state TV has set advertising guidelines for the first time since it began airing commercials two years ago.

Gosteleradio Chairman Yegor Yakovlev last week announced regulations to control content, fees and placement of commercials. He also said there are plans to create a single department to oversee advertising.

The new regulations forbid commercials for alcohol and tobacco or spots with pornography or racial slurs.

While Gosteleradio officially says it has never accepted tobacco spots, some TV officials, citing the company's desperate need for hard currency, said as recently as two months ago they would have accepted tobacco commercials for Western currency.

Now, however, Western tobacco spots won't be accepted, "even if they offer us dollars," said Victor Oskolkov, programming director.

The new regulations also prohibit airing commercials during news, religious and children's programs.

Also, ad time may not exceed 5% of any program's total airtime, and movies may be interrupted for commercials only once every 45 minutes.

He said proposed rates were between $5,000 and $10,000 for a 30-second spot.

Previously, there were few pricing standards. Rates varied drastically, depending on which unit of Gosteleradio was contacted about placement.

To coordinate ad placement, a central advertising department is slated to be operational by mid-month, he said. Until then, individual program producers can still cut their own deals, he added.

Mr. Oskolkov's group, which controls airtime between shows, has "many" spots, mostly Soviet, running currently, he said. His department keeps 50% of its profits to buy imported equipment. The remainder goes to Gosteleradio.

Mr. Oskolkov said Western interest has grown in the last month, citing Russia's positive moves toward a market economy as possible incentives for Western companies.

He is negotiating with a Japanese company as well as Hajo Valk, regional director for central Europe, and Simon Goode, corporate development director, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide, London, about the placement of Western advertising, possibly during the 1992 Winter Olympics coverage. □

As brand loyalty crumbles, marketers look for new answers

By Julie Liesse

Brands are under siege—and losing the battle.

Once the foundation of the marketing world, package-goods companies are being buffeted by internal and external forces threatening the future of their brands.

Marketers have made it easy for consumers to trade down and tune out presumably venerable brand names—by siphoning ad dollars to fund trade promotions, by producing all too similar ad messages, by losing the edge in product innovation.

While such top-flight product marketers as Kellogg Co. and Coca-Cola Co. seem to stumble, retailers including Wal-Mart Stores, Target Stores and Price Club are proving they understand the consumer of the 1990s. In the process, they've become arguably the best U.S. marketers.

By playing price as a trump card, these retailers are diverting consumer loyalty from brands to themselves.

At the center of this shift in how Americans shop are the package-goods industry's brand names, more vulnerable than ever. Will they survive the changing landscape? If so, in what form? Is the industry's concern about a return to brand-building too little and too late?

Eroding loyalty

The future of brands is of critical importance not just to marketers, but to retailers, ad agencies and the media.

"So much of what we take for granted comes from brands—all of our media systems depend on brand marketing," says Don Schultz, professor in the integrated advertising/marketing communications program of Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism.

Logically, as the time pressures of modern life grow, the reliance on brands should be growing, too.

"A brand is a memory shortcut," says Russ Ferstandig, a practicing psychiatrist and head of Competitive Advantage Consulting.

Brands are "guideposts," says Marylin Silverman, exec VP-director of strategic planning and international research for Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.

"Brand credibility brings a convenience of decisionmaking into consumers' lives," says Dave Murphy, president of the Betty Crocker division of General Mills.

Is that still true today?

The Roper Organization for a decade has measured brand loyalty to a broad group of package goods. Three years ago, 56% of those polled by Roper said they know what brand they want to buy when they enter a store. That figure fell to 53% in April 1990 and plunged to 46% by mid-1991.

"The recession has served as a catalyst, accelerating the underlying trends toward eroding brand loyalty," says Bradford Fay, project director at Roper. "But the trend preceded the recession and may well outlast it."

DDB Needham Worldwide's 15-year-old study of consumer habits has shown a drop in loyalty to well-known brands. The number of consumers saying they try to stick to well-known brand names has fallen to about 61% now from 75% in the late '70s. The big drop occurred in the recession of the early '80s—and "brand loyalty has never fuliy recovered from that drop," says Martin Horn, VP-associate director of the Delta Group research arm of DDB Needham, Chicago.

These recessionary trends, combined with the changed role of brands, mean the '90s have become "one of the most dynamic periods ever for brand loyalty," says Sanford Bredine, president of Bishop/Bredine Associates, a marketing agency.

"The relationship of a brand with a consumer in the 1960s was usually as a problem solver," Backer's Ms. Silverman says. "Then as brands became less and less different in the '70s and '80s, they were sold as badges."

It's not unusual that perfumes or apparel are bought and sold on their emotional values. But in the continuing evolution of brand messages, everyday products like toothpaste and frozen dinners today use marketing messages based not on practical value or product differentiation but on their emotional appeal.

What makes for brand loyalty today are all the intangibles—it's finding a consumer's need and filling it, whether it be sexual aspirations, social needs or self-esteem, says Tom Pirko, principal of Bev-Mark, a food and beverage consultancy.

Consumers, particularly the MTV generation, are comfortable with that.

"It's OK to say, 'Part of the reason I drink Pepsi is that it's cooler than Coke,' " says Melody Douglas-Tate, senior VP-group research director at Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

If a brand's advantage over its competitor is expressed as a largely emotional one, however, its success hinges more than ever on advertising. And many experts believe not only that advertising isn't working but that emotional messages aren't what consumers want to hear today.

"We have a marketplace that's overglutted with brands that are undifferentiated —brands that have not really identified themselves to the consumer as products that can't be substituted," Backer's Ms. Silverman says.

Part of the problem is the number of new products and new brands arriving on store shelves each year. The average supermarket carries more than 16,000 items, a 45.5% increase since 1985.

"Just the sheer proliferation of brand names has led to consumers viewing them as parity," says DDB Needham's Mr. Horn.

But experts also blame advertising.

"In package goods, the difference between one product and another is often a differentiated idea that comes out of the marketing," says Laurel Cutler, vice chairman-worldwide director of marketing planning for FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York. "As brands have to deal with an ever-smarter, ever-more pinched consumer, they must keep differentiating to earn the loyalty of their franchise. Some are doing that; some aren't."

A tenet of today's market research is that consumers formerly loyal to a single brand in a given category are increasingly becoming "brand switchers": They're loyal to a set of brands they view as essentially equal. Each individual purchase decision is based on shelf price, the availability of a coupon or other factors unrelated to the brand's equity.

The erosion of ad dollars has exacerbated the problem, says Richard Furash, national director-consumer products for Deloitte & Touche's consultancy group.

"The problem with branding today is that consumer goods marketers aren't investing in their brands; 70% of their marketing monies are being spent to push products through the retail channel," he says.

"Then it becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy: Manufacturers decreasing the amount of advertising behind their brands is one big reason people don't have the same brand loyalties they used to," Mr. Furash says.

An ongoing analysis of brand loyalty trends by the NPD Group arm of A.C. Nielsen Co. shows consumer loyalty to a brand usually declines when the brand doesn't maintain its share of voice in its category.

The growth of couponing has even changed the habits of those consumers already tagged "price-driven" by Leo Burnett USA's research department. Among those price-oriented consumers, many who were "brand experimental"—occasionally trying a new brand if they held a coupon for it—are now "brand irrelevant."

It's not just the message, though; differences between brands have eroded as well.

"The problem is that the majority of R&D is set to develop parity products—and then the majority of advertising is offering parity claims," says Gary Stibel, principal of the New England Consulting Group. "Knowing that both Eveready and Duracell are good is not OK. Advertising that communicates that products are simply 'good' is unaffordable."

Even if a brand does claim superiority, consumers may not respond.

"Whereas brands formerly were given the benefit of the doubt, brands now have to earn your trust," Competitive Advantage's Mr. Ferstandig says. "They are deceptors until proven innocent."

With pressure on to increase sales and profits in a country with flat population growth, package-goods marketers are cutting product costs—usually under the "productivity" banner. But by shaving a little here and a little there off product quality, marketers are at least partly responsible for the gap in consumer trust.

"Product quality has become a problem," says Scott Rahn, VP-corporate development for ConAgra, the country's No. 2 food marketer. "Some companies have sacrificed quality for making more money or holding to a specific price point. It's a valid criticism."

The trend in product quality alarms Tod Johnson, president of NPD Group. NPD regularly uses its focus groups to test product reformulations for its marketer clients.

"When we tested products in the '60s and '70s, I'd say 75% of the changes were product improvements," he says. "Today, two-thirds or even three-quarters of the testing we do is asking for consumer opinion on cost reductions. Product quality is being ignored."

National brands also lose their cachet when confronted by today's generation of lower-price store brands. Unlike their generic ancestors of the '70s, these brand alternatives make quality a priority, a critical ingredient to bargain-hunting shoppers. Private-label sales in supermarkets are at $24.7 billion, up 13% since 1989, Nielsen Marketing Research says, and are making serious inroads into classic marketing categories like ready-to-eat cereal, pet food and beverages.

"If everyone takes advantage, like the cereal people do—by raising prices at every opportunity—there will be a problem for brands," says retail consultant Gene Hoffman, of Corporate Strategies International. "Marketers will have created too many price voids for private-label to move in."

There's also a quality void.

"We tend to look at brand support in terms of media support, but as a brand

leader, you have to continue to innovate," says Paul Walsh, joint chief operating officer of Grand Metropolitan Food Sector and head of Pillsbury Co. "When times are tough, the easiest things to cut are new products and R&D. If you do that over a protracted period of time, you're inviting private-label into your category."

Conventional wisdom holds that private-label products fare well in tough economic times, when shoppers feel a need to trade down.

As consumers "trade down" this time around, "They're finding the quality of the private-label products is better," says Mr. Furash of Deloitte & Touche. "So when all is said and done, private-label is going to have gained more long-term share in this recession."

A shift in power

Private-label products are only the tip of the iceberg. Retailers are playing a broader and fast-growing role in controlling consumers' brand loyalties.

At a 1990 meeting, Ralston Purina Co. Chairman-CEO William Stiritz was asked, by a Wall Street analyst eager to see better profits, when his company could raise the price of Eveready batteries. His answer was both frustrated and matter of fact.

"One of the dominant trends in our business is the tilting of power to mass merchandisers and away from grocery chains and drug chains—whether they recognize it or not," Mr. Stiritz said. As a result, he said, "We may now be seeing our peak profit margins—we're getting drug-product margins on cereals, for God's sake. We're seeing the emergence of Wal-Mart—and Wal-Mart pricing—as the prototype for the retail business. It will happen, long-term."

Long-term? In just two years, Wal-Mart has added 357 stores, for a total of 1,882, with 1990 sales of $32.6 billion. Its store count has doubled in five years; its sales in four years.

In those two years, deep-discount drug chains Phar-Mor, Drug Emporium and F&M Distributors together have opened more than 200 new outlets, for 616 total stores nationwide. Estimates show warehouse clubs ringing up $32 billion in sales in 1992, nearly double the $17 billion total from 1989.

"The marketing world has underestimated some of the changes that have taken place at the retail level," says Sid Doolittle, managing partner at McMillan/-Doolittle, a retail consultancy. "The marketplace will never be the same again."

For now, brands are an important ingredient in the new discount channel.

"The fundamental thrust of a Drug Emporium, or a Pace warehouse club, is to make a price impression," says consultant Mr. Hoffman, a former president of Kroger Co. and Super Valu Stores. "Well, the best way to make a price impression is with a recognized brand—a national brand rather than a private brand. When these retailers can take a brand that's constantly escalating in price and discount it, the brands are serving a purpose for these retailers."

But a tour of a Phar-Mor or warehouse club is evidence that brands aren't necessarily treated as valuable allies.

If one strength of brands is that they allow consumers to buy on habit, without making decisions, discounters' merchandising strategy seems to defeat that goal; giving consumers a consistent selection of merchandise frequently takes a back seat to "power buying": buying large quantities at discount prices.

"These discounters often buy what they can get a good deal on—and if they don't have it the next week, they don't care," says consultant Mr. Bredine.

Through their inventory choices—which frequently include making one brand the "exclusive" supplier in a given category—discounters have eliminated brand choice in many aisles.

"These retailers have narrowed the purchase decision for consumers, while still offering the right items, or at least the right number of items," BevMark's Mr. Pirko says. "But in the transition, brands become less important and price more important to the purchase decision."

Despite the care that manufacturers expend on packaging, their products are often merchandised in haphazard fashion.

"There are floor displays all over the place in many of these stores," says Christie Hunt, associate at Willard Bishop Consulting. "It's a style that in general runs contrary to the careful merchandising philosophy of supermarkets."

Simply, the discount channel's focus on saving money—from "everyday low price" to double couponing—relegates choosing a brand to an afterthought.

"It's what we call the commoditization of American package goods," New England Consulting Group's Mr. Stibel says. "It's not just in Wal-Marts, but also in Food Lions and Krogers: Retailers are driving toward 'everyday low pricing' in a more effective fashion. In that setup, the value of the brand will deteriorate over time, right there in the stores."

Consumers are shopping at the new discount outlets because saving money makes them feel good—and paying more makes them feel chumped.

"With all the options out there today, the consumer is asking, 'Am I stupid to maintain my brand loyalty?' " Competitive Advantage's Mr. Ferstandig says. "On the other hand, saving money offers consumers the power of doing something smart; it's a positive stroke. You'd be surprised at the number of consumers of all income levels who are terribly proud when they save $1.50."

The recession has made saving money a more serious proposition.

"The need for minimal price outlay is going to grow as our society polarizes based on income," says Josh McQueen, exec VP-director of research at Leo Burnett USA, Chicago. "For many consumers, what that will mean is they'll be trying to get 'good enough' quality at the lowest price."

High-income bargain hunters

But a surprising number of discount shoppers are not those who need to save money. The typical frequent buyer at a discount drugstore has a household income higher than $30,000, according to Nielsen Marketing Research information. Consumers with a household income greater than $50,000 are 38% more likely to be frequent buyers at warehouse clubs than the average.

The lesson: It's not only the prices that draw shoppers to discount stores.

A trip to a warehouse club is "usually a bulk-up trip, for people who don't like to have to buy these products all the time," says Glen Terbeek, managing partner of the food and package-goods industry program at Andersen Consulting. "These consumers have the financial and storage capacity to stock up. And they're buying products for which the only possible shopping enjoyment is getting them cheaper."

Warehouse club shopping can be fun in its own way, though. Although package-goods marketers largely are failing to captivate consumers with their new products, consumers are intrigued with what they find at warehouse clubs: odd sizes and packaging, foodservice and institutional products, things they can't find anywhere else.

Although the reality is that many discounters carry only one brand of plastic wrap, light bulb or battery, Willard Bishop's Ms. Hunt maintains consumer perceptions may be different.

"Consumers may be looking at the deep-discount drugstores, for instance, as providing more variety than supermarkets. Usually each chain has a couple of key categories, like haircare or cosmetics, in which they carry unusual products and lots of variety. And they make that big variety statement as soon as you walk in the store."

The future of brands

So where do brands fit into this emerging discount channel of retailing? What happens when Wal-Mart, Target, Drug Emporium, Sam's Club, Pace Membership Warehouse, F&M and the rest have blanketed the country?

"At some point, most package goods will be sold in these high-volume emporiums," Corporate Strategies' Mr. Hoffman says. "Then, an individual store's ability to [establish and promote a] price differential disappears, because all the retailers price

Lever boss: Brands never stronger

David Webb, as president-ceo of Lever Bros., is steward of some of the most enduring brand names, including Wisk, Dove and All. Just this year, the new Lever 2000 helped propel the company to category leadership in bar soaps.

Unlike some executives who fear for the future of brands, Mr. Webb, a 40-year veteran of the marketing wars, is convinced of their staying power. He explains why to Advertising Age Reporter Judann Dagnoli.

Advertising Age: How do you feel about the strength of brands and the state of brand marketing today?

Mr. Webb: My deep belief—and I've got ample evidence to prove this—is that brands are stronger today than they have ever been. If you go to any supermarket shelf in this country, the dominant position will be held by the megabrands that have been built by a combination of two things: performance and consistent advertising.

AA: Advertising, then, is a means of communicating performance?

Mr. Webb: Lever 2000 . . . has taken eight years of the most sophisticated research to produce. . . . It was national only a month ago, yet that brand is now the biggest-selling brand in Wal-Mart. It's taken Lever to the leading position in the personal washing market for the first time in 75 years. . . . It's done that because it is a better-performing product.

It is performance and delivery of results that make products. What advertising does is to turn superior technology into a long-lasting asset, because the advertising turns that technology into a property.

AA: How does promotion fit in? Is it at odds with advertising?

Mr. Webb: No amount of advertising or, in my view, price cutting will take the place of performance and quality. No amount of advertising can save a bad product. Never has and never will. So if you look at the market today, what has happened as a result of the increasing skill of retailers is that the test which both performance and advertising have to go through to get [a product] to the top is an even tougher test than before.

So, in fact, it's actually that the stronger brands are stronger. Because if you're raising the bar of testing, and add in the kind of muscle that the major retailers are able to bring in terms of [ad inserts] and half-price sales, that those [measures] have even more likelihood to sort the sheep from the goats. . . .

This is making even more important the quality and the amount of advertising.

AA: But not all brands can afford to advertise.

Mr. Webb: Weaker brands in that situation do not enjoy the luxury of being able to . . . advertise. So the field of advertising is left to the strong brands and the powerful brands and the brands that have the strength, power and muscle to both fight that battle . . . and retain the loyalty and commitment of your consumers. . . .

With weaker brands, yes, they fall by the wayside and they can no longer fight on two fronts. They can't afford to offer the trade huge discounts, sell at a low net price and put money in budgets. But the powerful brands, of course they can. . . .

ONE ON ONE

Doug Goodman

Lever Bros.' David Webb says analysis will show traditional leading brands are still on top.

So, do I feel good about the state of brand marketing? I have never felt better about it in all my life.

AA: Why do most marketers appear to be cutting budgets in favor of promotion?

Mr. Webb: That's not true. Even the evidence doesn't bear that out. We are spending more on our advertising budgets this year than we have ever spent. Procter & Gamble is spending more than they have ever spent. . . .

It's the ones with the weaker brands. I have to do it with some of my weaker brands; I'm not trying to be holier than thou. If I depended on my weaker brands, I wouldn't be in business. That's not to say I don't have room for them in my total portfolio.

AA: Is there a point where ad spending cuts are merited?

Mr. Webb: If I am going to trim budgets, I will have a very clear set of priorities. The first is, when I have a clear message of product performance to impart, that my brand would not be selling to the consumer if I hadn't told them about it. The trade wouldn't be featuring it. There are retailers who will not accept a new product until they have seen the advertising. . . .

We actually have little [videocassette] units that we take to the retailer and run commercials. Not because we want to but because he insists on it. With one recent brand, I actually had a situation where I had to show an animatic because I didn't have the commercial ready in time.

AA: There have been numerous reports about strained relations between manufacturers and the retail trade.

Mr. Webb: The American retailer's been very shrewd. When we sit down . . . we take our total management team. [Retailers] want to see our development chemist, our computer experts. We explain our electronic data. It's a business collaboration. The relationship is not one of hostility. □

OCTOBER AD RESULTS

Quarter starts slow

Top 10 ad categories all down for first time

By Scott Donaton

The ride is still downhill.

Magazine ad pages and revenue for the first month of the fourth quarter were consistent with the downward trend through the third quarter.

MEDIA WORKS

Ad pages for October totaled 15,982, a 9.8% drop from the same month last year, Publishers Information Bureau reports. Revenues were $674.5 million, a 5.1% decline. Through October, pages fell 10% to 125,224.5; revenues fell 4.5% to $5.18 billion.

For the first time this year, all the top 10 ad categories posted declines, when a steep drop in computer and office equipment pages brought the year-to-date figures down 3.1% to 4,555.6. Ad pages for the month fell 22.8% to 648.1 for the category.

Of the 168 publications tracked by PIB—including 164 standalone magazines and four Sunday titles—125 of them posted ad page declines after 10 months. Forty-two showed increases for the period. One, Conde Nast Publications' Allure, was launched this year and couldn't be compared with 1990. The 8-month-old beauty magazine carried 232.5 pages through October.

Of the 125 magazines showing losses, 79 were down at least 10% from the same period last year.

The steepest percentage decline through October was at US; the monthly's pages fell 38.5% to 362. Art & Antiques' pages were down 36.1% to 437.5. Corporate Finance was down 35.1% with 193.2 pages. Financial World's 551 pages were down 35%, while Town & Country's 835.7 pages marked a 33.7% decline.

On the plus side, Compute posted the highest percentage gain through October: Its 681.2 pages were up 589.5% over 1990's 98.8. Walking's 174.7 pages were up 56.4%. Country America was up 40.5% to 361.5 pages. Success carried 369.7 pages, up 28.9%. And Entrepreneurial Woman's 329.9 pages were up 27.5%.

Newsweeklies continued to be among the hardest hit by the fall-off in pages. Time suffered a 22.7% downturn through October, carrying 1,669.5 pages.

U.S. News & World Report passed Newsweek after 10 months to take the No. 2 spot with 1,539.1 pages, down 4.7%. Newsweek was down 16.8% with 1,495.7 pages.

The three newsweeklies combined carried 867.8 fewer ad pages through October compared with the same period last year, down 15.6%.

Among women's service titles, five of the Seven Sisters were down in pages through October. Good Housekeeping led the field, despite a 7.1% drop to 1,289.3 pages.

Family Circle ranked second with 1,196.1 pages, an 11.2% fall. Ladies' Home Journal followed with 1,193.9 pages, down 1.7%. Also down were Woman's Day (1,022.5 pages, down 12.1%) and Redbook (889.5 pages, down 6.3%).

Better Homes & Gardens was up 1.5% with 1,037.8 pages; McCall's was up 3.5% with 835.4 pages.

Travel books appear to have made a healthy comeback after watching pages dive in the first quarter because of the Persian Gulf War.

Category leader Travel & Leisure carried 1,095.3 pages through October, a decline of only 3%. Conde Nast Traveler, whose pages fell 15.6% in the first quarter, was virtually flat after 10 months with 856.4 pages, down 0.3%. Travel Holiday was up 6.2% with 395.4 pages.

European Travel & Life was hardest hit: Its 335.4 pages were down 19.8%. National Geographic Traveler's 214 pages marked a 4.6% drop; Endless Vacation, with 184.9 pages, was down 19.2%.

Gourmet, a strong competitor for travel ads, carried 893.1 ad pages through October, a 13% drop. □

COVER STORY

By Janice Kelly

Cover Story is a monthly ranking of celebrities' popularity as reflected by their appearances on the covers of more than 30 of the nation's leading publications.

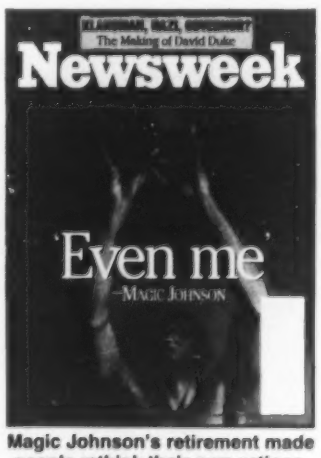
L.A. Lakers superstar Earvin "Magic" Johnson outscored everyone appearing on November magazine covers.

Mr. Johnson's retirement from professional basketball after testing positive for HIV generated an avalanche of coverage.

His cover appearances earned 12 points on the Cover Story index, which assigns points based on factors such as publication frequency and prominence of photos.

Tied for second place with 9 points were Jodie Foster, as attention continued for her directorial debut with "Little Man Tate," and River Phoenix, who co-stars in the critically acclaimed film "My Own Private Idaho."

Fourth place with 8 points went to Elizabeth Taylor, a perennial favorite for supermarket tabloids that chatted up her recent marriage and lifestyle.



Magic Johnson's retirement made people rethink their own actions.

A tie for fifth place gave 7 points each to director Spike Lee as stories addressed the growing controversy about production of his film about Malcolm X, and Keanu Reeves, who co-stars in "My Own Private Idaho."

Michael Jackson took seventh place with 6 points after the debut of his video "Black or White." Some coverage focused on the pending release of his album "Dangerous"; other stories discussed Mr. Jackson's family and sibling rivalry with brother Jermaine.

Eighth place saw a 5-point tie between talk show host Joan Rivers, with stories about her plastic surgery and her book "Still Talking"; new United States Associate Justice Clarence Thomas, who said he'll get over controversy surrounding his confirmation hearings through prayer and family support; actress Anjelica Huston, who stars in "The Addams Family"; and basketball superstar Michael Jordan.

Rounding out the survey with 4 points each were two larger-than-life TV stars: Roseanne Barr and Delta Burke. □

Diet Coke raises the dead to star with Elton John

Garfield

By Bob Garfield

Wait'll you see the new Diet Coke spot. Lintas:New York has employed a digital computer-generated genetically engineered cold-fusion matting process, or something, to bring Humphrey Bogart, Jimmy Cagney, Louis Armstrong, Elton John and a bunch of extras all together on one stage. Truly amazing. Real "Hey, Blanche, get a load of this!" stuff.

The Bogie-Cagney-Satchmo action is plucked from the movies, colorized and somehow superimposed on a nightclub scene with Mr. John as the headliner. It's seamless and wonderful, displaying astonishing technical virtuosity and raising two immediate questions: 1) How did they do that? (Answer: Beats me) and 2) What is it lately with the Coca-Cola Co. and technology?

In spite of its essential Cokeness, with all the tradition and sentiment and unmatched brand reverence it represents, and despite its astonishing global soft-drink dominance, Coca-Cola is obsessed with Pepsi-Cola's youthful image in the U.S., and has been trying desperately, pathetically to approximate it.

Pepsi-Cola signs hot entertainers; Coca-Cola signs tepid ones. Pepsi leverages its celebs around its brands; Coca-Cola merely trots them out there singing and dancing. Pepsi does funny ads built around the brands; Coca-Cola does unfunny "humorous" ads, scarcely about the brands.

Rating: ★ ★ ★

Pepsi contrives vast productions that emphasize the Pepsi image; Coca-Cola uses vast productions as a substitute for a coherent image.

Failing to match Pepsi with words and ideas, Coca-Cola and its agencies increasingly have turned to technology, though it would be more accurate to say technology has turned on them.

Cagney seems young and in the pink in an amazing new ad for Diet Coke, but Elton John, in hat above, is getting on in years, isn't he?

Forgetting for a moment the flavor technology that led to the New Coke debacle, we've seen botched 3-D ads in 1989; the surround-sound gimmick in 1990, a nifty effect drowned out by the commotion of 60 million Super Bowl parties; the MagiCan promotion fiasco, and the failure of specially rigged containers to surprise and delight lucky Coke customers (Clarence Thomas doesn't count); and finally the live-television "Crack the Code" sweepstakes, canceled at the last minute due to war in the Gulf, already in progress.

Now, at long last, they've succeeded—at least technically. People will love this ad no matter how well it sells, which is not very.

The problem starts with the jingle. The volume and bombast of Elton John's overarrangement obscure the lyrics and thus also the explanation for why—apart from sheer gee-whizardry—Cagney, Satchmo and Bogart are resurrected. It is because they, like just-1-calorie Diet Coke, are "just one" of a kind.

There's just one, and there's no mistakin' it/One, no way of fakin' it/One, for that real attraction/One, for the satisfaction/-One, just for the feeling/Diet Coke, just for taste. One calorie/Just for the cool . . . Just for the taste, Diet Coke.

A more than satisfactory bit of wordplay, lost in the din. Another puzzlement is why Lintas stints on the majorly cool movie-idol effects and lingers repeatedly on Mr. John, whose last hit song, not counting "Just for the taste of it," was popular, I believe, during the Coolidge administration. It speaks to Coca-Cola's notion of the pop-culture vanguard that its lead presenter, in order to seem contemporary, must be surrounded by dead people.

On the other hand, he's a fitting host for this crowd, being the first major entertainment property retouched via colorization. Here he's wearing candy-apple specs, red satin bowtie and the motley, bejeweled garrison cap of Post 2136, Senegal Veterans of Foreign Wars. So very, very '70s. So very, very forced.

So very, very Coca-Cola Co. □

Brands

low and consumers use those low prices as a benchmark.

"Right now, discount retailers are using brands as power, because they can price lower than supermarkets. But at some point, when the low-price philosophy has become the norm, the retailer will have to find new ways of doing his price philosophy."

That's when the forecasts get really interesting.

"When the retailer needs to get a price advantage, he can try to cut his own costs further or work out an arrangement for a new line of products that only he can carry," Mr. Hoffman says. "And that's where private-label could come in."

It's already happening. Although Wal-Mart has built itself with national brands, the retailer is experimenting with a Sam's American Choice brand of soft drinks and juices. Chairman Sam Walton's signed message on the cans reads: "Innovative products, made to our own standards, that we're proud to call Sam's American Choice. We believe these products, available only at Wal-Mart, offer better value than the leading national brands."

Northwestern's Mr. Schultz asks: "Brands won't go away, but will they be manufacturer brands, retailer brands or someone else's brands?"

Perhaps manufacturers will be able to tweak products enough to give each retailer something distinctive.

"There may be brands to be developed specifically for those kinds of outlets," says ConAgra's Mr. Rahn.

Mr. Doolittle points to an emerging trend he calls "divisive packaging": Manufacturers split products into different packaging to create a unique assortment for each retailer.

"We're giving different retailers different combinations of merchandise and working out different promotions so no one has exactly the same program" this Christmas season, says Donna Gibbs, Mattel's director of media relations.

Wal-Mart's wholesale Sam's Club chain this fall got a unique version of Mattel's popular "Bathtime Barbie" with a bathtub, packaged together for an end-aisle display that no other retailer has.

Another point of difference for national brands could be a higher price.

"Price is one of the lost variables in marketing; companies are blatantly using low price as a tool, assuming that low price is better. Maybe it's not," says Mr. Stibel of New England Consulting Group.

One of the real fears for brand marketers is that retailers will create brand loyalties not just with private-label goods but with a broader store image. Consumers can shop the Wal-Mart brand —"always the low price"—trusting they will get the best deal in each product category. Does it matter if that "best deal" is on Colgate, Crest or Aqua-fresh?

"It's reached a point where the manufacturer-retail circus is getting so out of control that brands don't have as much meaning as they used to. . . . People are transferring their loyalty from the brand to the retailer," Mr. Doolittle says. "It's hard to get people to give up on brands, and the fact that brands are important to consumers is part of the reason discounters have been so successful. But brand marketers are going to lose some ground as a result of all this change in the retail sector."

Planning for the future

Marketers and conventional retailers need to learn how to deal with the new discount channel now —"rather than waiting till we're forced in the year 2000," says Mr. Hoffman of Corporate Strategies.

Almost everyone in marketing agrees: In the face of this level of retailer power, manufacturers tempted to reduce marketing costs must resist.

"As a consumer-goods marketer, you have leverage to the extent that the customer wants your product. . . . " says Mr. Furash of Deloitte & Touche. "Some products regularly are sold below cost, because the manufacturer is able to command a premium in the consumer's eyes. The consumer draws that product through the channel even though retailers don't make money on it. A product like that is the closest thing to a diamond you can get in this industry."

Even those companies who've already struck long-term deals with discounters need to be vigilant.

"The man who has an exclusive deal with Wal-Mart has to know that he got that deal on price and that tomorrow a competitor will come in with a lower price," Mr. Stibel says. "When that happens, that manufacturer must . . . through product quality and consumer marketing, have convinced his retail customers that the product can't be dropped."

"Brands won't go away, but will they be manufacturer brands, retailer brands or someone else's brands?"

Marketers have seen the danger of cutting advertising too far.

"I see a trend toward companies making a serious effort to reallocate money to media, thereby streamlining promotion," says Maurice Kelley, VP-marketing services at SmithKline Beecham Consumer Products. "We've overdone the price thing in stores . . . and brand loyalties have eroded a tad there."

Brands' worst enemy

Protecting established brand equity and mining new "diamonds" isn't easy, though. Unfortunately, many experts believe the package-goods marketers themselves—their organizational setups and corporate mentalities—represent the worst threat to brand health and the greatest obstacle to developing breakthrough products.

Corporate megamergers brought brand equity into the spotlight during the '80s. But Wall Street's increased input in brand decisions and the huge bureaucracies that have developed at the megamarketers have left companies unable to properly manage those equities.

A lack of integrated marketing systems is a key problem that leading ad agencies and marketers are trying to address with executive training programs and new organizational setups.

"Corporations are not set up to handle brand equity," Burnett's Ms. Douglas-Tate says. "Decisions aren't based on the brand's needs."

Bureaucracies don't produce the best new products, either. Despite a general belief that the supermarket is saturated with undistinguished products, new items are racing into supermarkets—and failing at a faster and faster rate. The most innovative new products of the recent past, from Gatorade to Budget Gourmet to Iams dog food to Chicken by George, usually have been developed outside the expansive research & development departments of the leading package-goods marketers.

While small companies are launching breakthrough concepts, many larger marketers lament their overreliance on line extensions.

"The line extension strategy is going to play itself out at some point; it can't go on forever," says Mr. Pirko of Bevmark.

But the difficulty and expense of establishing a truly new brand name will force marketers to continue using their existing brands as umbrellas for new products—but with better-defined extensions.

"I think megabrands with microvarieties is the future of brands," says Burnett's Mr. McQueen, whose agency works on several, like Procter & Gamble Co.'s Cheer detergent.

Big marketers can score big hits, too—and not just with line extensions. The food industry's hottest brand remains ConAgra's Healthy Choice, which seeks to revolutionize the rest of the supermarket in the way it's dominated the freezer case in the past three years.

"We've gone through and analyzed why Healthy Choice worked," Mr. Rahn says. "Last February, at a management presentation, we agreed that one reason for its success was that there was a singular focus from the beginning on what it was. The objective was clear, the mandate from on top was there—but we were left alone to develop it. [Chairman-CEO] Mike Harper told us what he wanted, but he was not an interferer."

"We're seeing top management getting more and more actively involved in new products," says consultant Mr. Bredine. "Plus, companies are trying to find ways to reward people for developing new products."

That's one positive trend for new products and brands. Tangible new product and brand opportunities may also exist in consumers' interest in eating right and being environmentally correct.

Package-goods companies also have a perhaps underutilized chance to build consumer loyalty to broader, more corporate identities.

With billions of dollars at stake, package-goods marketers won't give up on brands despite the challenges emerging in the '90s. And they won't stop mining for gold, because of the power potential of a strong brand name.

"In the end, there are only a couple of things a company has—its people and its brands, both the trademarks and the good will they carry with consumers," says John Blair, VP-marketing services and new ventures for Quaker Oats Co. "And once you have a brand that's established in the minds of consumers, it's a crown jewel." □

Ailes out of '92 campaign

Negative ad guru says 'I will help the president if he needs me'

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—Roger Ailes, the "Darth Vader" of Republican political advertising, will not be a member of the president's 1992 campaign team.

Mr. Ailes, who guided George Bush's 1988 image transformation from "wimp" to decisive leader, Friday ended speculation about his political future by removing himself from any official involvement in the upcoming presidential campaign.

Mr. Ailes said he "will always help [the president] if he needs me."

A spokesman at Ailes Communications said that help would be limited to advice "if the president called and asked if he should do this or that."

The official statement came barely 24 hours after the office said Mr. Ailes, the Bush campaign's senior media adviser in 1988, was "in discussion with the campaign's management about a role" in the 1992 effort, but would "not undertake the same role as in 1988."

Questions about Mr. Ailes' place in the 1992 campaign surfaced weeks ago, but were fanned Dec. 5 when his name wasn't on the Bush re-election team list announced by the White House.

Mr. Ailes' sudden lack of any role in the 1992 race leaves unanswered the question of how the 1992 Bush campaign will handle its advertising.

"The campaign might want to take more of a Tuesday Team approach as was used in 1984, when, under Michael Deaver, the Reagan people had a group of advertising execs from Madison Avenue to develop ads," said a well-in-

How FCB's muscle doomed breakaway

By Scott Hume

CHICAGO—"Desert Storm Begins."

That was the message left on Mark Weinstein's word processor screen the morning of Nov. 27 after he tendered his resignation as senior VP-managing director of Foote, Cone & Belding Communications' direct marketing unit and walked out of the agency.

The office's president, Jim Tennant, tendered an identical letter of resignation, and 18 others, 20% of the total staff, turned in their letters a half-hour later, just as they planned.

Ironically, the breakaway from FCB/Direct didn't even last as long as the Persian Gulf War, and wasn't nearly as successful.

Six days after Tennant Weinstein Organization opened, it closed, a victim of the legal muscle FCB amassed to squelch the creation of a direct-marketing rival. All but Mr. Weinstein returned to their jobs at FCB/Direct.

The maneuver failed so quickly and so completely that it could serve as a model of how not to orchestrate an agency breakaway, if the scenario of events contained in an FCB lawsuit is correct.

How the breakaway principals executed their plan, the myriad mistakes they made, all outlined in the lawsuit filed in Cook County Circuit

Despite the smiles, Jim Tennant (l.) and Mitch Engel face the difficult task of putting FCB's direct marketing unit back together after the breakaway was crushed.

Coen: 1991 ad spending down from '90

NEW YORK—McCann-Erickson Worldwide Senior VP-Director of Forecasting Robert Coen is expected to report U.S. ad spending dropped in 1991, sources familiar with the report say. That would mark the first year-to-year spending decrease since 1961. Mr. Coen, who will address the PaineWebber Media Conference this week, expects ad spending to pick up in the second half of 1992. In his most recent forecast, he predicted a 7% to 9% increase in 1992 ad spending.

'Daily News' hopes dim

Maxwell upbeat, but rivals set to move in

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—As the publishing empire of Robert Maxwell crumbles, rivals of the Daily News here are getting ready to pounce.

The News filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection last week. However, Kevin Maxwell, son of the late Robert Maxwell, insists the newspaper isn't for sale and that every attempt will be made to save the tabloid.

But industry watchers believe the title will fold or be sold.

Last week both the New York Post and New York Newsday said they are drawing up expansion plans based on the possibility of one fewer daily in New York.

"The Daily News is continuing along the sad path to its demise," said Peter Apert, a media analyst with Cyrus J. Lawrence Inc. "I think the long-term prognosis is not good."

An investment banker who asked not to be identified was more blunt: "I think the whole thing is going to explode. I would bet that the News shuts down right after the Christmas season. It's a cash drain."

Mr. Maxwell, chairman and publisher of the News, appeared at a news conference Friday to announce a "partnership" between the paper's board and its unions to draw up a reorganization plan.

"The Daily News is continuing along the sad path to its demise. I think the long-term prognosis is not good."

He insisted the paper has "sufficient cash" to continue publishing for the short term and isn't for sale. But, he said, "the reorganization plan will almost certainly call for fresh equity."

While he didn't say where an equity infusion might come from, he said "all avenues will be explored," including the sale of a minority stake to employees or outside investors.

The same unions provided concessions to the Post last year when it was on the verge of financial collapse. In exchange, the unions received partial ownership of the paper.

But analysts and competitors are skeptical about whether the News has the funds to keep publishing and say the paper will need to seek union concessions and other cost reductions to stay afloat.

The tabloid's Chapter 11 filing listed total assets as of Oct. 27 of $37.4 million and total liabilities of $53.3 million. The petition indicated projected cash receipts of $21.6 million in the next 30 days

New suit hits Riney

Former employee alleges fraud in dismissal

By Alice Z. Cuneo

SAN FRANCISCO—A former top Hal Riney & Partners executive has sued the agency for fraudulently inducing him to quit his job and give up his right to share in the proceeds of a sale of the company.

Peter Murphy, former Riney executive creative director, said in his complaint he was tricked into signing an agreement giving him a 3% share of the proceeds from the purportedly "imminent" sale of the agency if he agreed to leave.

The severance agreement limited Mr. Murphy's eligibility to share in sale proceeds for two years from his November 1989 resignation, or through last month.

The suit, which names the agency and Exec VP-Chief Financial Officer Lyn Muegge as defendants, was filed in Superior Court here last May. Advertising Age recently learned of its existence.

Attorneys for both parties declined to comment. Efforts to reach Mr. Murphy, Ms. Muegge and Hal Riney, agency chairman-ceo, were unsuccessful.

Mr. Murphy, now an exec VP-copywriter at Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, said in the suit that Ms. Muegge falsely indicated to him "repeatedly in words or substance that a sale of the agency to an English company was imminent" when he agreed to resign.

In its response filed with the court by Rosenblum, Parish & Bacigalupi, San Francisco, Riney's law firm, Riney denied telling Mr. Murphy the agency was about to be sold.

"There was no 'imminent' sale to anyone," the agency response said.

Riney acknowledged in its court filings a possible sale of the agency to Gold Greenlees Trott, London, had been discussed. However, it isn't clear how close the parties ever were to an agreement.

"There was no deal with Hal Riney that nearly got done. I don't want it said that GGT [Gold Greenlees Trott] nearly bought Hal Riney."

Matthew Allen, GGT group finance director, told Ad Age last week the agency had met with Riney officials, "but there was no deal with Hal Riney that nearly got done. I don't want it said that GGT nearly bought Hal Riney."

Mr. Murphy alleged Ms. Muegge, in an effort "to induce" him to leave the company, falsely told him he might not receive his share of any sale proceeds unless he resigned.

The complaint also alleged Ms. Muegge falsely said attorneys had been hired to draft sale documents and a closing date was set. Mr. Murphy contended he was led to believe the agency even had rented a hall for the closing celebration.

He was later told the proposed sale had "fallen through," the complaint said.

Mr. Murphy's 3% share would have been $1.2 million, according to the complaint, giving the purported sale a total value of $40 million.

Mr. Murphy was a copywriter with Ogilvy & Mather's San Francisco office, headed by Mr. Riney. That office became Mr. Riney's shop through a buyout in January 1985; Mr. Murphy later became its first executive creative director.

The complaint said Mr. Murphy earned 2% in phantom stock in the agency, increased to 3% in 1989, by helping win the Stroh Brewery Co. and Saturn Corp. accounts.

The agency didn't deny the existence of the severance agreement but countered that Mr. Murphy overstated his contributions to the agency and that he "failed to discharge his duties" as creative director throughout his tenure.

Mr. Murphy is seeking compensatory damages of $1.2 million plus an unspecified amount in punitive damages. He has requested a jury trial.

Riney is also a defendant in a sexual harassment suit brought by former agency secretary Debby Ann LeBeau earlier this year. The agency has denied Ms. Le Beau's charges and has filed a countersuit (AA, Nov. 11). □

Threat of ad tax resurfaces as Fla. seeks new revenue

By Steven W. Colford

Florida may be back on the tax attack.

Gov. Lawton Chiles is threatening to seek a new ad tax, an issue that helped spur the downfall of his predecessor, Bob Martinez.

The governor is giving serious consideration to trying to tax advertising and other services, or to taxing adjusted corporate revenues.

It's unclear whether national ads would be affected, as they were by the short-lived 1987 tax. That extension of the state sales tax was repealed after just six months, due to a firestorm of controversy that included threats by national marketers to pull conventions from Florida.

If either ads or corporate revenues are taxed, the losers will be advertising and the media, expecially TV and radio.

Advertising and media lobbyists plan to meet this week with legislators and representatives of the governor.

Gov. Chiles, a Democrat, is expected to unveil his tax preference before the Legislature reconvenes for its 1992 session Jan. 14, said Kathy Putnam, deputy press secretary.

A special one-week session beginning Dec. 10 in Tallahassee is expected to deal with budget and spending reform to clear the way for the governor's new revenue proposals, Ms. Putnam said.

Several tax options appear alive, government and business representatives say. One of the most likely is repealing all current exemptions from the state's 6% sales tax, including the exemption held by the ad industry for creative and media expenditures. Another possibility is a 1% to 2½% tax on adjusted corporate revenues.

"We tried this for six months in 1987 and it didn't work. The small Florida advertisers paid the tax back then, while the national advertisers didn't; they just discounted rates 5%. We lost $70 million."

"We tried this for six months in 1987 and it didn't work," said Pat Roberts, exec VP of the Florida Association of Broadcasters. "The small Florida advertisers paid the tax back then, while the national advertisers didn't; they just discounted rates 5%. We lost $70 million."

Ms. Putnam said even if the governor proposes extending the sales tax to advertising and other services, the affected services could seek a new exemption.

If there's a tax on revenue, ad time and space purchases as well as creative expenses by ad agencies and clients apparently would be exempt, said Dennis Brown, executive director of the ad industry's State Advertising Coalition.

But such a tax would pose a different set of problems for media, he said.

Mr. Roberts and others say Gov. Chiles is more likely to propose a revenue tax, which would hit the media because marketers' ad expenditures are the media's "revenue." Businesses would be asked to pay the tax regardless of whether they are profitable.

A revenue tax would especially harm Florida radio and TV stations, Mr. Roberts said, since broadcasters across the state are as much as 20% below their revenues from a year ago. As many as a third of all Florida radio and TV stations have laid off personnel.

If the tax hits the media harder than advertisers, it could create a schism between the two groups and mean less unified lobbying against the tax than there was in 1987.

Mr. Roberts also said Democratic Senate President Gwen Margolis and other legislators adamantly oppose taxing advertising as a service. □

My meeting with Ovitz

CAA boss says he's no threat to agencies

By Marcy Magiera

He uses the term "macrovision" frequently, puts his hand over his mouth when he talks and says he is not out to take over the advertising agency business.

Meeting Hollywood power broker Michael Ovitz for the first time is the kind of experience one doesn't forget quickly.

At first, "macrovision" struck me as a red herring, a meaningless term thrown out there by Mr. Ovitz to avoid saying anything concrete about exactly what it is that Creative Artists Agency, his powerful talent agency, is doing for Coca-Cola.

Soft drink giant Coke in September named CAA its new "worldwide marketing consultant," surprising the marketing world and throwing a scare into the advertising agency business. Was Mr. Ovitz muscling in on new territory?

But the more he repeated "macrovision" over the course of our half-hour meeting, I started to buy the premise that vision is exactly what Coke wants from CAA. Not new-product ideas, or CAA client Kevin Costner as its secret weapon against Pepsi, but some high concept of how Coke should position itself globally over the next several years.

Mr. Ovitz himself was not what I expected. I thought I'd been summoned to meet a very quick-witted, fast-talking, aggressive New York type. Instead, what I found when I was ushered from his private conference room stacked with African antiquities still in boxes into Mr. Ovitz's unmarked but locked office overlooking the Wilson's House of Suede & Leather on Santa Monica Boulevard was a soft-spoken, reserved man.

He disarmed me when he adjusted the window blinds to cut the glare from the late afternoon sun, which streamed into where I perched on his sitting room sofa. His handshake, too, threw me off. It wasn't a strong grip, but the fingertip touch some male executives reserve for women.

He entered the room from what I judged to be his inner sanctum, the working space hidden around the corner from the sitting room, and took a chair on the other side of a coffee table topped by books about African antiquities and CAA-building designer I.M. Pei, a bowl of gardenias and another of Hershey's kisses.

It became apparent fairly quickly why Mr. Ovitz agreed to meet with me. It seemed his patience was wearing thin with speculation about what CAA's doing for Coke.

He's stubborn in his belief that until there's a definitive plan, CAA's work for Coke shouldn't be of interest to Ad Age or the advertising industry.

In a surprising twist of naivete for so powerful a businessman, I came away with the impression that Mr. Ovitz really didn't understand how CAA's dealings with Coke might be perceived as a threat to ad agencies.

Maybe he's just discounted the ad business for so long that he has no clue about the pressure the changing nature of the business is putting on ad agencies.

Or maybe it's all a smokescreen. Even for a trained observer and skeptic, it's hard to get a read on Michael Ovitz, at least in half an hour.

He seemed to think that ad agencies thrive only by stealing each other's clients and that the paranoia this creates makes it impossible for agencies to see the addition of CAA to a marketing team as a plus.

Talent agencies are different, he seemed to say, because though they also thrive on wooing clients from competitors, the core philosophy of the business is to build long-lasting relationships.

I got the feeling Mr. Ovitz likes to build relationships with potential partners before any business is transacted. After all, he did have personal relationships with top Coke executives for 10 years before CAA officially became a marketing consultant to the company October 1.

And despite his assertions that he'd be willing to talk about Coke when and if the marketer executes CAA's ideas, I can't exactly envision sitting down with Mr. Ovitz for a tell-all, heart-to-heart about Coke's marketing strategy.

He was obviously proud of the team he's assembled to work on Coke, an eclectic mix of 14 CAA staffers chosen to represent a broad range of ages, lifestyles and jobs within the agency.

Smeal/Galella Ltd.

Michael Ovitz

He also seems proud of the fact that of the already legendary 160 ideas CAA initially presented to Coke, none was celebrity-driven.

In the last two months, that apparently has changed, with CAA recently recommending celebrities Coke might use to develop CAA's "macrovision." Contrary to popular belief, I got the impression that none of the celebrities being considered for this event-driven, macro-marketing plan, likely to begin next year and take at least one year to play out, are CAA clients.

Mr. Ovitz was paternal about his employees, and I had to believe him when he said if I walked around CAA and talked to the people who worked there I'd really like them.

As I left the building I noted the comfortable way high-powered agents and their assistants would lean over balustrades to converse from floor-to-floor, undaunted by the cavernous lobby between them. A lobby, which, by the way, was being set up for an evening tasting of wines from CAA client Francis Ford Coppola's winery.

If people do interact like this at CAA, maybe Mr. Ovitz was being straight about the company's role with Coke and that word I'm still wary of, "macrovision."

Or maybe "macrovision" is just a hypnotic term to bring journalists who persist in writing about him—even when he says there's nothing to report—over to his way of thinking.

Know what I think? I don't know. □

Defending RJR's move

The editorial about RJR and its decision to go with Mezzina/Brown (AA, Oct. 21) is biased and pointless and undermines what Mezzina/Brown has accomplished.

Because Mezzina/Brown is a small "start-up" shop does not mean they will remain so. Didn't Young & Rubicam and Apple Computer and countless other giants start out as two-man shops? So what if Y&R had as many as 100 people working the RJR account. For all we know, 98 of them could have been monkeys with car keys and Mezzina and Brown said, "We're outta here!"

I also would like to believe that RJR is smart enough to base its decision to move on Messrs. Mezzina and Brown's proven track record and not to "save a few bucks," as Ad Age suggested.

Volvo replies

Your editorial (AA, Nov. 25) dealt with what you have alleged to be an "unfair" Volvo advertisement concerning safety. As with your earlier editorials on Volvo ads, it was not preceded by a phone call to learn Volvo's side of the story. Judging by its content, I would suspect you had spoken to someone from Chrysler.

I think your readers are entitled to some facts from which they may develop their own opinions.

- The ad clearly states the source of the data and the years the study covers.
- The Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, upon whose study the ad is based, is an independent, highly respected, source. . . . The study, released in April 1991 . . . is the latest comprehensive study of passenger vehicle fatalities available.
- Chrysler claims that the Chrysler minivans covered by the study were not equipped with "minivan" airbags as their present minivans are. The Volvo 240 wagons sold during the period of the study were not equipped with airbags either. Today they are standard equipment on all Volvos sold in North America. . . . Therefore the addition of the airbag should not alter the relative safety of the vehicle.
- Does one death per 10,000 [accidents] offer a serious safety threat? It does if it is someone you love. The Volvo advertisement never stated minivans were unsafe. It stated what the study data concluded, that the death rate for minivans as a group was twice as high as the safest car in the study—a Volvo 240 wagon. These are facts we believe people are entitled to know.

At Volvo, we don't want to scare people into buying our cars. But we want people to think about just how important and complex automotive safety is. We want people to ask more questions about safety before they make their purchase decisions. We do not believe that is unfair.

Cable's ad allure strong despite some budget cuts

Brands feel recessionary pinch after run of double-digit hikes

By Joe Mandese

Top advertising brands aren't buying the rosy projections for cable growth—at least not according to their spending patterns for the first half of 1991.

While Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau projects total cable ad revenues will grow 19% this year to $3.023 billion, an Advertising Age analysis of the top 15 brands in six leading ad categories shows their spending dropped in aggregate by about 7% during the first six months of the year.

"Some categories have been especially hard hit by the recession," says John Hunt, VP-director of research of CAB. But he says there are a number of variables affecting the cable spending patterns of many of the top brands that may not be relevant to overall cable spending patterns.

"I don't see a need at this point to re-evaluate our projection," he adds.

Although some brands increased their cable spending significantly during the first half, three out of the five charted brands cut cable budgets from the same period last year.

While the recession may have had a role in some of the cuts, cable buyers contend the recession also may be driving the increases of brands that have boosted cable budgets.

"Cable is a way for national advertisers to get national exposure at a lower out-of-pocket cost. Sometimes they can't afford big broadcast network schedules," says Hal Zwick, exec VP-director of media services of Wunderman Worldwide, which buys cable TV for several of the medium's bigger advertisers, including Sports Illustrated.

While SI cut its budget about 15%, to $4.6 million, during the first half, Mr. Zwick says cable still represents a good media value for the magazine.

"Cable is able to target the customers of individual magazines and the [cost per thousand is] efficient. It brings in a low cost per order. And the value of the customers from cable TV is higher than it is from spot broadcast TV," he says.

Time Warner's Time-Life division finds "that cable provides us with higher quality customers, as opposed to conventional broadcast television," says Barry Rosen, director of broadcast media. "It's still an efficient medium for us."

Indeed, Time-Life's records and tapes increased cable spending 20% to $2.7 million during the first half of 1991, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service data.

However, Time-Life books reduced its cable outlay 33% during the same period to $3.1 million.

Still, Mr. Rosen said cable continues to be an integral part of Time-Life's overall media strategy, which relies heavily on direct response.

"The cable networks are so highly targeted that if we have a series on history videos or nature videos, Discovery Channel works terrifically for us. We have a lot of music product and MTV works great for that. It enables us to target, it's efficient and the customers we get from cable perform better for us," says Mr. Rosen.

AT&T, another cable advertiser heavily dependent on direct response, is up about 49% in the first half, to $8.1 million. Linda Urben, manager of media advertising, says the brand's aggressive use of cable does not reflect a recessionary strategy.

"We didn't rethink our media plan on any given day for any given reason. We use the different vehicles for what they can do for us in their efficiencies as well as their environment."

"We are very programming specific, and there's a lot of good programming on cable," says Ms. Urben, referring to AT&T's sponsorship of CNN's "Science & Technology Today" segments, CNN business news updates and a variety of programming on Arts & Entertainment.

Similarly, Bob Bolte, director of media services of Clorox Co., says his brand's cable strategy is tied to program specific associations on such networks as Lifetime, Discovery Channel, TNT, Nick at Nite and VH-1.

He cites Clorox's sponsorship of "Growing Up Together" on Lifetime.

"It provides us with the ability to develop and place programming, which provides us with a compatible advertising environment along with solid cost-efficiencies and selective audience targets," he says.

While Clorox's spending is down 49% to $623,800 during the first half according to the LNA data, Mr. Bolte notes that data only reflect buys made on six cable networks: CNN, ESPN, Family Channel, MTV, WTBS and USA.

Programming has also been key to Subaru's cable strategy. Through the first half of 1991, Subaru increased its cable spending 19% to $1.3 million.

"Subaru tends to be fairly upscale in their use of cable, but we've been trying to broaden that," says Scot Butler, exec VP-media director of Subaru's agency Wieden & Kennedy, Cherry Hill, N.J.

"Within each network, we bought very selectively," explains Mr. Butler. "For example, on A&E, we bought 'The Best of David Letterman,' 'David Wolper Presents' and 'Night at the Improv.'

While Anheuser-Busch also has broadened its use of cable networks, it is still primarily focused on sports.

Indeed, with a four-year $100 million deal on ESPN, A-B is the biggest advertiser using cable TV.

Its Budweiser currently is the largest brand on cable TV, spending $17.3 million in 1990, according to LNA. Through the first half of 1991, Budweiser's cable spending was up 42% to $10.5 million.

While Michelob was down 78% to $512,400 and Busch was down 66% to $522,100 during the first half, those appear to be brand-specific strategies and do not reflect an A-B shift from cable.

"We're really just following the trends of where our viewership is going. And as that trend continues our cable budgets continue to grow," explains Tony Ponturo, A-B VP-corporate media and sports marketing.

"About 35% of the national TV audience is now no longer from the broadcast networks, so we're following the eyeballs as they go to cable and other alternatives," he adds.

While A-B's cable emphasis has been primarily sports programming on ESPN, WTBS, TNT and USA, it has recently begun to broaden it to include heavier use of MTV and VH-1 and Comedy Channel.

"In 1992, we're even looking at what Arts & Entertainment has to offer," says Mr. Ponturo, adding, "As the programming quality continues to grow, cable TV becomes more attractive."

While it is unlikely A-B's beer brands will expand beyond cable buys reaching the core audience of 21-to-34-year-old males, Mr. Ponturo says other A-B brands may soon be evaluating buys on such networks as Nickelodeon and USA.

"As Sea World develops and as Eagle Snacks develops, it's not out of the question that down the road, we wouldn't have a broader look in cable," says Mr. Ponturo. □

"We didn't rethink our media plan on any given day for any given reason. We use the different vehicles for what they can do for us in their efficiencies as well as their environment."

The cost of pitching new business soars

Recession-plagued agencies are caught in a vicious circle as they chase accounts

An Advertising Age roundup

For advertising agencies, the sober reality of these recessionary times is that the new-business stakes have been raised higher than ever.

Account reviews have become less personal, more time-consuming, more demanding and more expensive—especially for the losers. And the pressure doesn't take a holiday.

Consider the seven agencies pitching the Mercedes-Benz of North America account.

If their strategy presentations this week go well, they may be named finalists in the review for the $100 million account. But that also means a second round of presentations—possibly before New Year's Day. That means working up to or on Christmas.

The likely price tag: anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000 each, without a creative presentation. Mercedes said it would give each finalist $60,000 to cover expenses.

The level of new-business activity at some shops may never pay for itself, given changes in agency compensation, said Guy Day, a founder of Chiat/Day/Mojo and current vice chairman of McElligott Wright Morrison White, Minneapolis.

"The real cost of pitching, using the new math of operating an agency, is fairly sobering," he said.

A midsize agency chasing a $10 million account is unlikely to recoup presenta-

Hasbro, Mattel key early upfront

Buys come after NBC exits Sat. 'toons

By Joe Mandese

NBC's decision to pull out of the children's animated TV market has sparked the earliest upfront market ever.

Two major toy companies, Hasbro and Mattel, have cut expensive 1992-93 kids TV deals with several cable networks, and other advertisers to children are discussing upfront buys with Fox Broadcasting Co.

The moves were sparked by NBC's decision to replace its 3 hours of Saturday morning animated shows with news and information programming.

The unusual advanced sales activity has been limited to cable TV and Fox. The Big 3 TV networks haven't begun discussing potential deals for the '92 fall season; their upfront sales normally come in spring.

Hasbro's agency is Griffin Bacal, New York, and Mattel is split between Foote, Cone & Belding and Ogilvy & Mather.

The Fox talks were initiated by advertisers concerned that NBC's pullout, as well as recent declines in overall kids TV viewing levels, will significantly reduce the supply of rating points available to reach kids during the 1992-93 TV season, driving prices for kids shows up to record levels.

If the early cable deals are an indication, that may indeed be the case.

For example, Hasbro and Mattel paid twice as much as previous years in the new deal with Turner Broadcasting System's TBS and TNT cable networks, said a Turner source. Turner's cost per thousand for kids 2 to 11 years old increased to a range of $5 to $7 from a 1991-92 average of about $3, the source said.

However, a buyer involved in one of the Turner deals called those estimates "ludicrous," noting that the increase was only in the "15% to 25% range."

Even so, the early cable deals suggest

Sears in review? Talks with shops fuel O&M rumors

By Kate Fitzgerald

CHICAGO—Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s meetings with other agencies have recently rekindled talk that its relationship with core agency Ogilvy & Mather is in trouble.

Sears officials last week gave O&M a vote of confidence, denying that agencies including DDB Needham Worldwide and Leo Burnett USA, both of which handle Sears units, are part of any review.

Sources say the retailer may be shopping for new advertising ideas for some of its store-within-a-store concepts.

Speculation about an agency change has persisted throughout the year as Sears' monthly sales results have been generally lackluster, in contrast to its hefty Merchandise Group ad budget, estimated at around $250 million to $300 million.

A retail advertising budget of that size in the current recessionary environment seems to be a constant source of attraction to agencies nationwide, several of which have

Infiniti drives back to edge

By Cleveland Horton

After months of running what some have called cookie-cutter advertising, Infiniti has decided to return to risky business.

Although the new campaign, scheduled to break Dec. 23, doesn't re-create the controversial rocks and trees that Nissan Motor Corp. USA used to launch the division in late 1989, it's "out on the edge a little bit," said Bob Paske, Infiniti general marketing manager.

"It's a little risky," he said. "But it will not be offensive to people."

While careful not to offend, as some of the earlier advertising did, the new campaign tries to promote the personality of the cars, the company and its customers.

The tone of the ads is designed to appeal to the self-assured individual not seeking peer approval. In fact, the ads poke fun at conformists.

One spread for the flagship Q45 sedan throws down the gauntlet with the headline: "Defy the Joneses."

The copy reinforces the stand-apart appeal of the car: "You aren't your neighbor. And you don't want to be." It ends with: "The Infiniti Q45. It's not the most common choice. But then, how common were you trying to be?"

Sources say the TV spots borrow a technique from the hit movie "Goodfellas," in which the action on screen is narrated off-screen, as if to a friend.

The commercials will focus on the total enjoyment of owning an Infiniti and compare it with the cherished feel-

Media malaise to persist

TV awaits Olympics; magazines hike subscriptions

By Scott Donaton and Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—Broadcasters hope the impact of the Olympics and elections will spark a recovery in ad spending next year, but publishers, anticipating a continuing decline in advertising, are asking readers to pick up more of the tab.

That was the message of media companies appearing at the annual PaineWebber media conference last week.

Not surprisingly, 1991 was fairly gloomy for most media companies.

Bob Coen, senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, revised his overall U.S. ad spending projection for 1991 largely because of deeper than expected downturns in some media.

He predicted local newspaper ad revenues will fall 6% to $26.7 billion, network TV will drop 5% to $8.9 billion and magazines will fall 4% to $6.5 billion.

"It will not be a return to the good old days."

Mr. Coen said overall 1991 ad spending would fall 1.5% to $126.7 billion compared to 1990, the worst decline since World War II. But he was more optimistic for 1992, predicting total ad spending would increase 6.2% to $134.6 billion.

All national broadcast media, both radio and TV, will rise 7.8% in 1992 to $23.3 billion, he said, attributing the increase largely to the impact the Olympics/election year will have on stimulating the economy.

National print will rise 5% to $10.9 billion in 1992, he predicted.

"I think we will have bigger and better gains in the national media, particularly in broadcast," Mr. Coen said.

Locally, he predicted newspaper ad spending will climb 6.5% to $28.4 billion and broadcast will rise 5.7% to $15.4 billion.

Others were even gloomier in their predictions for spending in 1992.

Down 'n' dirty politics

Experts say '92 campaign ads could be vilest yet

By Steven W. Colford

Political advertising experts—led by Republican consultant Roger Ailes—believe the 1992 presidential election will feature the most vicious ads in U.S. political history.

These experts contend "attack" advertising increases amid economic problems, which are making President Bush vulnerable. Such a media assault could force the president into a defensive, counterattack campaign, they believe.

"The Democrats are all lightweights with no track records and with no world view. They will do one thing—savage George Bush," Mr. Ailes told Advertising Age last week. "It will be the most vicious ad campaign in the history of American politics."

Mr. Ailes led the '88 Bush media team but won't be part of the '92 effort.

Widely regarded as a master of the political "attack" commercial, Mr. Ailes predicted the Democrats' ads will zero in on President Bush's domestic agenda, especially if the economic doldrums linger deep into 1992.

Sharing Mr. Ailes' view was Robert Squier, the Democratic political consultant, who believes the memory of 1988's presidential defeat still looms in the minds of Democrats.

POLITICS 92

"In 1988, the paid media was first, attacking Michael Dukakis, followed by George Bush attacking Michael Dukakis," Mr. Squier said. "Now, payback time has finally arrived because the Democrats think they never got their rebuttal time in 1988."

1992 could be a watershed year for negative political ads, said Kathleen Jamieson, dean of the Annenberg School for Communications, University of Pennsylvania, and a leading authority on U.S. politics and political media.

"The circumstances certainly are there for that to happen, with the president seen as responsible for a national economy in serious trouble," she said.

Republican attack ads will be the roughest, said John Sasso, Michael Dukakis' 1988 campaign manager.

"If I were the Bush administration, I guess I'd attack the opposition because there is no record to campaign on," said Mr. Sasso, now president of Advanced Strategies, a consultancy.

But it's risky for a Democrat with a markedly inferior recognition factor to take on the president with ads that merely attack, said Democratic consultant Mark Melman, of Melman-Lazarus, a polling company.

"You want people to know more about you first, state your case," he said. "If George Bush was at 65 or 70 points in the popularity polls, then maybe you'd try to tear him down."

President Bush needs Mr. Ailes and will have to call on him eventually, said Cathy Farrell, a former business partner of Mr. Ailes at Farrell Media, a media buying company that worked for the '88 GOP presidential team. □

New studies in the Journal of the American Medical Association say Camel's "Smooth character" leads kids to smoke.

'JAMA' lights new fire under Camel's ads

By Judann Dagnoli

A powerful coalition of health groups wants R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s Old Joe character to walk his last mile.

Citing three studies from the Journal of the American Medical Association contending the cartoonlike ads lead kids to smoke, the Coalition on Smoking or Health last week petitioned the Federal Trade Commission to "take immediate action against RJR's cartoon camel."

The coalition—formed by members of the American Heart Association, American Cancer Society and American Lung Association—called the Camel ads "the most egregious example in recent history of tobacco advertising targeted at children."

RJR has featured the "Smooth character" of Smokin' Joe—or Old Joe, as the character is also known—in its U.S. advertising since late 1987. The account is now handled by Mezzina/Brown, New York, a new breakaway agency from Young & Rubicam, which previously handled Camel and Old Joe.

The petition is limited to the Camel ads, but the JAMA studies called for a total ban on tobacco advertising and promotions as part of an effort to protect children from the dangers of tobacco.

Ad industry groups said the JAMA studies might lend credence to the coalition's stance on RJR's Camel advertising but will have little impact on the group's goal of restricting all tobacco advertising.

"Even if the FTC takes a close look at RJR's ads, it's no

Magazine floodgate opens

Marketers turn to publishing for more clout

By Scott Donaton

A growing number of marketers are donning another hat these days—that of magazine publisher.

Companies are creating their own magazines as a way to develop a stronger bond with customers while gaining greater control over shrinking marketing budgets and over the editorial environment in which their ads appear.

While some of the corporate publications carry ad messages solely from their parent companies, many solicit outside ads, sometimes from competitors, as a way to gain credibility and offset publishing costs.

Coming in 1992 are magazines from Slim-Fast Foods Co., Pillsbury Co., Wyeth-Aherst Laboratories, Chase Manhattan Bank, IBM Corp. and Hallmark Cards.

They join other titles published by the likes of Federal Express Corp., Benetton, General Motors Corp., Nintendo of America and Philip Morris USA, several of which are undergoing changes.

The flood of corporate magazines hasn't gone unnoticed in the publishing industry, where they're viewed as competitors for ad budgets.

"Potential advertisers are responding very favorably."

"It's a trend, and I think it grows out of the compression of funds, the continuing examination of current advertising procedures and the search by advertisers for something different and unique," said John Mack Carter, director of magazine development for Hearst Magazines.

Valerie Muller, VP-media director at Pedone & Partners, New York, said she's open to buying space for clients in magazines owned by other advertisers as long as the publications have editorial credibility and aren't merely promotional vehicles for their publishers' products.

Slim-Fast Foods, in a joint venture with Welsh Publishing Group, will launch Slim-Fast Magazine as a quarterly next year after publishing a test issue last June.

The magazine is aimed at Slim-Fast users and will focus on fitness, health and nutrition. It will be sold on newsstands and to subscribers with an initial rate base of 500,000 and will accept outside ads.

Pillsbury's Fast & Healthy is slated to make its debut in April and will be sold through subscriptions and at supermarket checkout counters.

In addition to ads from its own brand groups, Pillsbury is solic-

Beer distributors develop taste for new Bud ads

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch may have reaped warm reviews for its new non-sexist Budweiser ad policy, but the brewer is just now overcoming the chill distributors gave the first spots.

A-B officials last week acknowledged the new "Nothing beats a Bud" executions, aimed at overcoming a sales slide by the nation's No. 1 beer, were received with near silence by distributors at an October convention.

Their unhappiness with the advertising also fueled rumors A-B was disturbed enough to review the status of longtime Bud agency D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis.

But Budweiser Brand Manager August Busch IV said distributors have finally warmed to the new approach and said no review of the $75 million-plus account is planned.

"I am very much in love with the advertising," he said. "I couldn't believe the timing. It couldn't be more appropriate."

"It received a cool reception [at the October convention]. I don't think it struck the chord," said one East Coast distributor attendee, who asked to remain unidentified. "Some of the ads didn't mention Budweiser before half the spot was over. There didn't seem to be any bang to it."

A Midwestern wholesaler who also asked to remain unidentified said distributors were more concerned with the creative's neglect of the traditional working-class Budweiser drinker than A-B's plan not to portray women as sex objects.

"They were going after the contemporary drinkers, and we thought they needed more blue-collar," the wholesaler said.

Distributors are concerned because A-B flagship Budweiser, which makes up much of their volume, has experienced sales problems. Last year, Budweiser posted its first volume decline in more than a decade, down 0.8% to 48.1 million barrels shipped, according to Impact, an industry magazine. Still, Budweiser accounted for 24.9% of the nation's beer volume.

Jerry Steinman, publisher of Beer Marketer's Insights, said last week he expects Budweiser's volume to drop 1% to 1.5% this year, the result of several factors including a higher alcohol tax and the growth of Budweiser's siblings, Bud Light and Bud Dry.

That kind of dropoff isn't as great as the industry's projected 2% decline, so the brand may actually show an increased share. But the performance still doesn't thrill distributors.

Last week, 15 distributors met with A-B officials as part of a regular program to discuss concerns. Instead of criticizing the ads, the panel expressed chagrin about the earlier lack of support. □

Breaking the rules

Fox's Doritos show just another example

By Joe Mandese

Fox Broadcasting Co. isn't through breaking the rules of network TV.

The fledgling network said last week it will counterprogram during CBS-TV's Super Bowl halftime show, and that's winning kudos from agency executives, who say the Big 3 networks are feeling pressure to follow Fox's innovative lead.

"Fox is breaking the rules, and that's making it easier for advertisers to approach the three major networks with new and innovative ideas," said Steve Farella, exec VP-media director at Young & Rubicam, New York, an early Fox supporter. "Fox is breaking another rule—that you don't counterprogram the Super Bowl—and we applaud it."

Fox will run a special live "In Living Color" program called "Doritos Zaptime/The In Living Color Super Halftime Party."

The special, sponsored by Frito-Lay's Doritos brand, will feature a $1 million grand prize giveaway announcement. Frito-Lay will use the event to launch new Bite Size Doritos.

Fox President Jamie Kellner said the network has several similar projects on the drawing board, but they require support from advertisers willing to share the risks.

"Frito-Lay is putting a lot of money into this, and I think it's exciting that advertisers are willing to take risks with their advertising money. I'm hopeful that it is a big success and that they look back on it and find it one of the best investments they ever made," Mr. Kellner said. "It's fun when you find advertisers as willing to take risks as we are."

A "Doritos Zaptime" game piece.

Frito-Lay hasn't said what it's paying to sponsor the special, but the company estimated it would have paid about $2 million on a campaign during CBS' coverage of the Super Bowl.

"Counterprogramming may have its risks, but big wins demand taking big chances," said Frito-Lay VP-Marketing Steve Liguori.

Agency media executives say Fox's innovative programming and promotion, marketing and sales strategies are forcing the Big 3 to make changes faster than they would have.

For example, Mr. Farella said Fox's recent decision to accept condom commercials that focus on disease prevention was a major force in the Big 3 networks' re-evaluation of their policies.

At its recent affiliate board meeting, NBC said it would step up public service ads and public affairs programming about the use of condoms for disease prevention and continue to review its policy on accepting paid condom commercials.

CBS said it's reviewing its policy, while ABC's affiliate board met last week and was expected to discuss the topic.

"When one network, even if it is Fox, makes a decision to accept it, it puts pressure on the other guys to accept it," said Alec Gerster, exec VP-media and programming services at Grey Advertising.

Mr. Farella said Fox's programming strategies have pressured the Big 3 to pursue new methods.

Earlier this year, Fox adopted a strategy of rolling out series year-round rather than using fall launches, as the Big 3 have. Fox is also experimenting with "interstitial" programming between regular programming, intended to provide a theme to the evening lineup.

The cast of "Beverly Hills 90210" hosted Fox's Halloween programming; "Married . . . With Children" star Ed O'Neill has also hosted theme nights.

Mr. Kellner said the network plans to keep viewers and advertisers guessing.

"We have a younger audience than the other networks do, and we find that they like to be surprised and excited," he said. "And that's what we're trying to do: find ways to make it more exciting, different and surprise people once in a while.

"And that's exactly what our halftime show does. The Super Bowl game is exciting, but the halftime is basically boring." □

DDB Needham wins in Henkel ad shuffle

By Dagmar Mussey

DUESSELDORF—Henkel rewarded DDB Needham Worldwide for persistence and loyalty last week with about $52 million in new business.

The detergent and toiletries marketer, after becoming disillusioned with Eurocom, also rewarded BBDO Worldwide and Lowe Group Europe, dividing another $42 million in detergent, cleanser and toiletries accounts between those two shops.

Last month, Henkel fired Eurocom, its largest agency, because the newly created Euro RSCG couldn't decide whether to keep Henkel or Procter & Gamble Co., an RSCG client, following the October merger.

Klaus Morwind, director of Henkel's international detergent and cleanser business, cited several reasons for giving DDB Needham the major portion without a pitch.

He said Clorox Co., in which Henkel has a minority stake, uses DDB Needham's Chicago office as one of its U.S. agencies.

"DDB Needham was one of the very few international agency networks that was still [conflict-] free to accept Henkel as a client."

BBDO, a sister agency of DDB Needham within Omnicom Group, is already a major Henkel agency, and Henkel wanted to expand its relationship with Omnicom agencies, Mr. Morwind said. Lowe also is a major Henkel shop.

DDB Needham picks up Dixan and Atlas detergent brands, billing an estimated $45 million, after trying for years to break into Henkel's detergent roster. It also picked up $7 million in toiletries from Poly Soft and Poly Swing hair styling products, Le Chat soap and Shim.

The company didn't break down the new-business split between BBDO and Lowe. The accounts represent $35 million in detergent and cleanser spending and $7 million in unspecified toiletries.

In addition, Publicis FCB-owned Baums, Mang & Zimmermann won the $6.5 million Pril dishwashing detergent account and $7 million for Theramed toothpaste and City Men toiletries. Paris-based FCA picked up the Minidou fabric softener business.

Agency sources say the redistribution of Eurocom business makes DDB Needham Henkel's largest agency, with about $80 million to $90 million in billings. BBDO handles about $65 million and Lowe about $60 million, agency sources say. □

Poll: Ads strain credibility

By Joe Mandese

Unbelievable!

That's how most consumers react to ad messages on TV and in magazines. But far fewer express doubts about specific ads.

In a third-quarter telephone survey by Video Storyboard Tests, seven out of 10 respondents said they believe few, if any, of the ads they see on TV or in print.

The findings are in stark contrast to the primary goal of most advertisers: to make credible claims that will encourage consumers to buy their products.

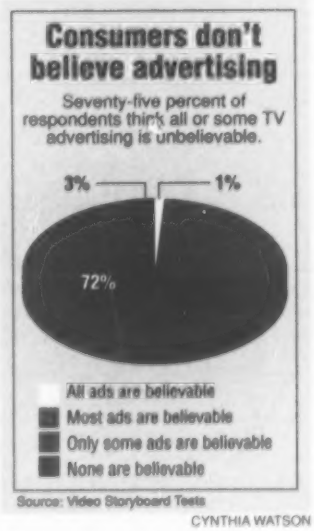
"The trend toward unbelievable ads is growing," said Dave Vadhera, president of Video Storyboard Tests.

He said more marketers are using outrageous—though not necessarily false or misleading—ad themes to break through clutter.

In the unaided, random-sample survey, based on calls to 600 households, 75% of the respondents said they found either all or some TV ads unbelievable, while 70% were equally incredulous about print ads.

But when asked to watch specific commercials, only 10% of respondents identified any that lacked credibility.

The discrepancy between these two findings suggests consumers' general consensus that ads are unbelievable may disappear when they view specific TV commercials or print campaigns, Mr. Vadhera said.



Source: Video Storyboard Tests

CYNTHIA WATSON

Consumers also may retain more of the advertising they find hard to believe, he said.

Even conservative categories such as package goods are experimenting with the technique, said Mr. Vadhera, citing Procter & Gamble Co. as an example.

In a recent campaign for All-Temperature Cheer detergent from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, P&G miraculously depicts a badly soiled handkerchief being cleansed by a mere tumble in a cocktail shaker containing cold water and Cheer.

Other recent examples of "unbelievable" ad campaigns include one for Dr Pepper Co. from Young & Rubicam, New York, showing a man walking on ceilings; a series of spots from Chiat/Day/Mojo, in which Eveready Battery Co.'s Energizer bunny "interrupts" parody commercials; and a campaign whose very premise was based on unbelievability: American Isuzu Motors' lying Joe Isuzu, created by Della Femina, McNamee, New York and Los Angeles, which no longer has the account.

As a result, many package-goods marketers are turning to the technique, which has virtually replaced the traditional package-goods approach of using irritating messages, such as Charmin toilet tissue's Mr. Whipple, or Wisk detergent's "ring around the collar," he said.

One of the only irritating campaigns to show up in recent years on Video Storyboard's quarterly polls of ad campaign popularity was Burger King Corp.'s 1986 "Herb the Nerd" campaign, from J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, Mr. Vadhera said. Another was Energizer's 1987 campaign from DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, featuring annoying Australian football star Jacko.

But "if you make too outrageous a claim, nobody will take you seriously," he said.

The survey had a margin of error of plus or minus 4%. □

PR isn't marketing

Using its tools as sales aid masks danger

By William N. Curry

The recent rise of marketing public relations has created visions of sugar plums dancing in the heads of marketers, brand managers and others seeking market share that is increasingly costly to achieve through paid media. The popularity of Thomas L. Harris' "The Marketer's Guide to Public Relations" reflects the search by marketers to exploit new promotional strategies.

But marketers and their advertising colleagues should bear in mind that marketing public relations is little more than the systematic application of a traditional subset of public relations tools and functions such as promotion and publicity. The danger for today's organization is that marketing public relations obscures what the management function of public relations is all about.

This distinction and the need to maintain a broader public relations perspective are critical. For when marketing thinking overtakes public relations thinking, the organization leaves itself vulnerable to marketplace challenges that are often far greater than any competitor can mount. Lotus' Marketplace: Households, Perrier's purity, Volvo's integrity, and G. Heilman's PowerMaster malt liquor all faced serious (or fatal) marketplace threats brought on not by competitors, but by public reaction to the organizations' own policies, practices, products and promotions.

And marketers, even such organizations as Kraft and Procter & Gamble, demonstrate repeated (and avoidable) failure in dealing with such challenges. In too many cases, whatever the competence of the public relations professionals who manage the corporate response, marketing thinking (or worse, lawyer thinking) crowds out public relations thinking.

Crucial challenges to businesses and products, like those cited here, increasingly come from outside the transactional exchange of values—the province of marketers. They come from key, non-customer groups and forces in the social and political environment—the domain of the management function of public relations.

Broader than such notions as brand management, public relations thinking seeks to protect the organization's overall business franchise, its decision-making autonomy, its reputation, as well as the organization's investment in employees, channnels, customers and products. How? By aligning the organization's interests with the public interest so that both are served.

Tylenol prospered because Johnson & Johnson's credo aligns it with "doctors, nurses and patients, mothers and all others"; Gerber failed to align itself with mothers and thus suffered when reports circulated of glass in its baby food. Volvo's apologetic response to its misleading "Bear Foot" commercial achieved alignment; Procter & Gamble was at variance with the public interest in defending its claims of "fresh" Citrus Hill orange juice.

A recent issue of Public Relations Journal explored the increased use of marketing public relations by drug firms. A quoted survey conducted by Wang Associates found increased use of marketing public relations to promote pharmaceutical products and projected still more use in the future.

Survey respondents cited "marketing support" as the most common reason for using outside public relations firms and "marketing savvy" as a key factor in selecting which firm. But the survey also noted that most of the executives polled anticipate some form of regulation of the industry's marketing public relations in the future.

This is precisely the kind of peril that can result when marketing thinking overwhelms public relations thinking. Public relations thinking would seek to alter drug company practices to better align the industry with the public interest—thus precluding regulation and optimizing business autonomy. Indeed, two issues later, Public Relations Journal reported on a new crackdown by the FDA on video news releases issued by the pharmaceutical industry.

So what should an organization do? Empower the management function of public relations—its competence, role and organizational reporting—to lead you to alignment. Public relations is purposive action and communication by an organization to align its interest with the interests of key groups on whom it depends, to the benefit of both. It incorporates sensitive responsiveness, not just defensive reaction. It listens, and then it shapes change in organizational policies and practices to achieve alignment.

It is not just product promotion, press agentry, free media coverage, "getting our story out" or blindly defending brands and products under attack. It is about advancing your interests while meeting the public interest. Public relations, properly empowered and practiced, overarches marketing promotion and should not be subsumed by it. □

'Ad Age' aided Ad Council

There was one omission from your brilliant special advertising section, "The Advertising Council: 50 Years of Public Service" (AA, Nov. 11). Understanding that modesty forbade you mentioning it, may I now say that Advertising Age, from the days of [founder] G.D. Crain Jr. on, helped nourish, challenge and invigorate the Ad Council's work at every turn?

Ad Age was the schoolmaster at our elbow—questioning, chiding, inspiring—and always giving currency and importance to our work.

During the late '60s and the '70s, when our country was threatening to tear itself apart, the Ad Council, as writer Warren Berger aptly observed in his narrative, was in the thick of it, trying to do what we could to communicate positive solutions to the overwhelming problems facing our nation. Caught up in all kinds of crossfire, the council became a hot news item. First thing each Monday morning, I'd grab Ad Age to see what that morning's issue had to say about us. It was our report card. Pass or flunk? You were always there to tell us.

In this and so many other ways, Ad Age has been one of the Ad Council's greatest benefactors. And you still are—viz., your superb 50th Anniversary section. "Good, the more communicated, more abundant grows."

The most poignant comment in the section was Sid Bernstein's, when he said that the November 1941 meeting of the Association of National Advertisers and the American Association of Advertising Agencies, at which the Ad Council was created, was the most important business meeting he ever attended.

Thanks, Mr. Chips—and all the rest of the faculty!

Robert Keim
Madison, Conn.

Editor's note: Mr. Keim was president of the Advertising Council from 1966 to 1988.

When we started looking seriously into the history of the Advertising Council, some of our people visited the Ad Age library in New York and collected a 3-inch-thick file of articles mentioning the council over 50 years.

Even before reading that wonderful supplement on the Ad Council anniversary, we knew it would put into perspective the contributions of advertising to the public interest. After all, you've been doing this for years.

A year into World War II, G.D. Crain wrote about how the War Advertising Council had created a sympathetic understanding of advertising in government. As he pointed out in the supplement, Sid Bernstein covered the historic meeting which gave birth to the idea of the Ad Council. As Washington reporter for Ad Age, John Crichton, chronicled the early days; the influence of his articles gave the council impetus to take hold at the start.

Advertising Age recognizes the unique and abiding role for advertising in furthering knowledge and the public interest. That attitude has been demonstrated clearly through 50 years of Ad Age involvement—as narrator, friend and occasional critic of the Ad Council. This involvement by the leading trade paper has helped give public service a higher profile and priority in our industry than it has in any other. For all this and more, thanks.

Artzt doesn't get it

I am both disappointed and amused by Edwin Artzt's Orwellian comparison of advertising to exercise and promotion to recreation (AA, Oct. 28). He must do his workouts at Burger King and if promotion marketing is his idea of a wild time, then he needs to get out a little more often.

The philosophical battle between the virtues of advertising versus promotion should have ended years ago, and hardly warrants a banner headline in Advertising Age. It is not true that promotion denigrates brand imagery, just as it is not true that advertising can't build sales. It is not a matter of promotion. It is not a matter of advertising. It is all about marketing.

David Ogilvy understands this. If Mr. Artzt did, maybe Procter & Gamble's third-quarter net earnings wouldn't have dropped.

O&M ads bring back our old friend Sears

Garfield

By Bob Garfield

In a world where everything's turned upside down, whom do you trust?

The CIA, upon further consideration, is saying please excuse previous message, what's dangerous is abolishing the Soviet Union. The late mythic capitalistic hero Robert Maxwell has posthumously been transfigured into a fat, $1.2 billion bad Czech. And, in defense of the public's right to know, CNN aired a rape trial in fine gynecological detail while reducing the rest of world events to nine-word blurbs every 20 minutes.

Black is white. Up is down. Yes is no. And, if we are to draw any conclusions from what Sears, Roebuck & Co. is now telling us, old is new. For the past two years, in response to critical structural problems in its retailing business, Sears (Where America Used to Shop) has been trumpeting its new self: its famous-name merchandise, its "everyday low prices," its new look.

Forget about that. In two-dozen new spots from Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, new is out and old is in. Sears (The High Overhead Store) is suddenly positioned as a faithful old friend. Trust your old pal, Sears says, "You can count on me."

"We've grown up together," jingles the handsome SweetCam anthem, filled with images of Americans being wholesome. "I've relied on you and you on me. Though both of us keep changin', growin' every day, there's one thing you can count on: Look around you everywhere, you know I'll always be there. You can count on me. You can count on me. Wherever you go, you know where I'll be. . . ."

Rating: ★ ★ ★

Homespun Americans and images of palpable trustworthiness are the means by which Sears communicates its unique brand of value.

Lots of desperate people, of course, say "You can count on me" just prior to skipping town with your wife and bankbook. But this seems different. Like that wonderful KitchenAid spot—which transforms a sappy easy-listening standard, "Through the Years," into an emotional, beatific reverie and actually generates nostalgia for a dishwasher—this 60-second paean positions Sears (Home of the Service Agreement Pressure Sell) as inextricably linked with your memories, your values, your belongings, the very fabric of your life.

A new strategy? Hardly. As recently as six years ago we were told, "There's more for your life at Sears." And there was, but it was that dreary and unpleasant part of your life you'd have just as soon forgotten—the brown, tweed sofa and plastic three-piece suit part. Whipsawed by stylish department stores on one end and mart discounters on the other, Sears was your first stop for dull, expensive goods. But a lot has changed.

While its real estate and personnel entanglements doom it never to be price-competitive with Wal-Mart, the Sears we knew ("No, you'll have to ring that up over there") has undergone a radical merchandise and merchandising makeover, vastly improving the shopping experience. When those changes materialized a couple of years ago, Sears had no choice but to scream "contemporary" and "price," which a disconcertingly offbeat Ogilvy campaign did. Now that the changes have taken root, the company can once again concentrate on value and image—with the understanding that Sears' retailing future depends on how successfully it sells image as part and parcel of its value.

Leavened with tactical spots introducing such innovative, Sears-exclusive benefits as KidVantage (which unconditionally guarantees children's clothes to be outgrown before they're worn out), this campaign offers the imagery and the texture to begin the process, to stop being an "it" and start being a "me," to transcend even Sears' status as an institution and to imbue the chain with an almost spiritual connection to the American family.

Anything less and Sears dissolves like the Soviet Union. In other words, a power vacuum that no service contract covers. In other words, another alarming threat to the American way of life. □ grounds to ban all tobacco advertising," said Dan Jaffe, VP at the Association of National Advertisers. "That's absolutely illogical and inappropriate."

'JAMA' burns 'Joe'

The three studies, published by JAMA last week, were contested by RJR.

The first estimated that the "Smooth character" depicted in Camel advertising boosted RJR's share of "the illegal children's cigarette market" from 0.5% before the campaign to 32.8% today.

The study further estimated that RJR's sales of Camel to kids rose from $6 million before the ad campaign to a current $476 million on the strength of the character.

RJR angrily denied the study's findings, characterizing them as "absurd."

"Camel's performance since the 'Smooth character' campaign began in 1987 simply doesn't support the article's absurd conclusions about youth share of total sales," RJR said in a statement.

Citing figures from industry analyst John C. Maxwell Jr. of Wheat, First Securities, RJR said: "Camel's share of [total] market [at 4.3% in 1990] has been basically flat for five years."

The second JAMA study found that kids ages 12 and 13 registered the highest recognition of the Camel campaign and that "Camel's market share among 12-to-17-year-old boys [24.5%] was almost twice that among 18-to-24-year-old men [12.7%]."

RJR disputed that study as well.

"According to [U.S.] Office on Smoking & Health numbers, 3% of 12-to-18-year-olds at least occasionally smoke Camels," RJR said. "Survey data from [the government] indicate that cigarette smoking among teen-agers has essentially been flat for the past few years and that 15.7% of teens age 12 to 18 are at least occasional smokers."

The third study concluded 6-year-olds recognize Joe Camel as representing cigarettes at a rate nearly equal to their recognition of Mickey Mouse as representing the Disney Channel.

"Approximately 30% of 3-year-old children correctly matched Old Joe with a picture of a cigarette compared with 91.3% of 6-year-old children," the study said.

"If you say, 'You are a minor, you are not allowed to smoke,' it will have just the opposite effect."

For its part, RJR has responded that the industry wouldn't intentionally leave itself open for advertising restrictions on cigarettes by targeting underage smokers.

"Contrary to anti-smoking activists' rhetoric, it is not in the tobacco industry's best interest for youth to smoke," the marketer said.

"Whenever a young person smokes, it is the cigarette manufacturers that are blamed—not the parents, peers or lifestyle of the young person. This concerns us greatly because it increases the potential for government restrictions on our ability to communicate with adult smokers," the company said.

Last October, RJR began running an outdoor and print campaign in both English and Spanish urging young people not to smoke.

The ads will move into 30 markets next year. They've been running in New Orleans; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Detroit; San Diego; Tampa, Fla.; and RJR's hometown, Winston-Salem, N.C.

The company has been aiming for placement of the non-smoking ads on outdoor boards within 500 feet of schools, said Peggy Carter, RJR manager-media relations.

Created by Lockhart & Pettus, New York, one ad shows kids smoking in a public restroom with the theme, "And you think this looks cool?" A second is themed "Don't create a smoke-screen between you and your friends."

Also included is a program for parents, in which parents who smoke can get a booklet telling them how to convince their kids not to. That program is supported by print ads running in Sunday magazines and an out-of-home campaign.

Ms. Carter said the company's goal with the campaign is to tell kids "Don't smoke. You're not ready. Adults can weigh the controversy [over smoking], but we wanted to reinforce the message to kids."

But John Pierce, associate professor at the University of California, San Diego, and author of one of the JAMA studies, said: "If you say, 'You are a minor, you are not allowed to smoke,' it will have just the opposite effect." □ ing & Research, predicted a zero to 2% real growth in media spending in 1992, or 4% to 6% after factoring in inflation.

Factoring in a 1992 inflation rate of 4%, Mr. Myers said ad spending for newspapers, broadcast syndication, consumer magazines and out-of-home media would actually decline in 1992 in terms of real growth.

David Poltrack, senior VP-planning and research for CBS, predicted ad spending on the Big 3 networks would rise 5% to $8.9 billion in 1992, attributing about 2 percentage points of that growth to Olympics spending.

From the agency point of view, Philip H. Geier, chairman of McCann-Erickson's parent, Interpublic Group of Cos., predicted a 5.7% ad spending increase, with most of the gains coming in the second half.

WPP Group Chief Executive Martin Sorrell said one of his agencies had budgeted for a 5.6% increase in client spending for '92. But he said the figure would be "difficult to achieve."

Mr. Sorrell said a 2% to 3% increase in spending was a more realistic outlook.

The most pessimitic forecast came from Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s Zenith Media Worldwide.

Zenith Chairman-CEO John Perriss said North American ad spending fell 5.9% this year and predicted declines of 2.2% in 1992, 0.8% in 1993 and 0.7% in 1994.

Fred Meyer, chief financial officer of Omnicom Group, said he expected 1992 U.S. ad growth to be aproximately 6% to 7%—"as unlikely as this seems to all of us at this point."

Publishers of magazines and newspapers weren't as optimistic in their forecasts.

Most said they don't expect a dramatic recovery in advertising in 1992 and are instead looking to strengthen their circulation revenues to offset the ad decline.

"We're doing business in an era dramatically different from the one we prospered in during the '80s," said S. Christopher Meigher, president of Time Inc. Magazine Co.'s New York magazine division. "The consensus is while we're hoping for an upswing in advertising spending, it will not be a return to the good old days."

In addition to looking for new ways to satisfy advertisers' needs, he said, publishers have to raise the prices they charge readers and offer them extra value in return.

For example, Time Inc. is studying the use of selective binding and ink-jet printing technology to create customized magazines. Readers would pay higher subscription costs to have additional editorial material on specific topics bound into their magazines.

The same concept is being used on a limited basis by some publishers already, and a growing number are exploring it.

Time Inc. is also testing a "Sports Illustrated Super Subscription," for which readers would pay about $8 more than a regular subscription to get such additional materials as a newsletter, calendar and video based on the magazine.

Mr. Meigher said circulation revenues now account for about half of magazines' total revenues, up from about one-third in 1975. He predicted circulation revenues will account for 60% of total revenues by the end of the decade.

Newspaper publishers also said they're asking readers to pay more for their products.

During 1991, there's been a 56% increase in the number of daily newspapers selling for 50¢ and a 28% jump in the number of Sunday papers selling for $1.25, said Bruce Murray, circulation sales manager at New York Newsday. The number of daily papers selling for 25¢ fell 13%, he said.

Reader's Digest Association said it hasn't been as hard hit by the recession as most other media companies because ad revenues account for only about 9% of total revenues. The association also said it plans to raise both ad rates and subscription prices for its special-interest magazines and flagship Reader's Digest next year. □

CBS fights back

Gloria Estefan to star in Super Bowl show

By Joe Mandese

CBS-TV will try to prevent viewers from tuning away from its halftime coverage of Super Bowl XXVI with a special performance by pop star Gloria Estefan.

Fox Broadcasting Co. earlier announced it would air counterprogramming to the Jan. 26 event at halftime, apparently forcing the CBS countermove.

Fox will air a special live episode of its hit prime-time series "In Living Color" at that time.

Last week, Fox said it will counterprogram the CBS/Estefan halftime performance with a live performance by a major recording artist, to be named this week.

"The halftime performer that Fox has offers a very distinctive choice that is on the other end of the spectrum from Gloria Estefan," said Jay Coleman, president of Entertainment Marketing & Communications International. "It will be a performer that fits the profile of Fox and 'In Living Color.' "

Mr. Coleman said the promotion and advertising efforts for the Fox show, to be targeted at teens and young adults, will be the biggest ever for a one-time TV entertainment special.

"They can claim anything they want, but it's more of an example of promotion by press release," said George Schweitzer, senior VP-marketing and communications at CBS. "They're not even on seven nights a week. Our CBS daytime schedule reaches more people than all of their shows except three."

■ New study says media weight has little to do with effectiveness of Super Bowl spots—Page 21.

CBS' Super Bowl halftime show will feature a winter sports theme that will serve as a platform for the network's coverage of the 1992 Winter Olympics. It was unclear how Ms. Estefan's performance will be integrated into the show.

"The Super Bowl is the biggest television event of the year, and all of the amount of Fox promotion won't make a difference," Mr. Schweitzer said.

The Fox effort will break this week with an estimated $1 million radio campaign by Frito-Lay, via Tracy-Locke, Dallas, to be followed by in-store displays, newspaper inserts and ads targeted at children on Whittle Communications' "Channel One" school TV program.

Fox's on-air promotion effort will appear during the two weeks preceding the Super Bowl.

The Fox special, dubbed "Doritos Zaptime/The 'In Living Color' Super Halftime Party," is the first major effort ever to counterprogram Super Bowl halftime coverage.

"We're pretty confident that we have a good chance of getting people to switch," Mr. Coleman said, "because the halftime show has never really been designed for a television audience." □

Olds backs new Achieva with buy-back guarantee

By Raymond Serafin and Cleveland Horton

Oldsmobile will take the unprecedented step of offering to buy back its new Achieva from West Coast customers if they decide they'd rather buy a different car, even from a competitor.

That shows the extraordinary steps General Motors Corp. is willing to take to begin making inroads into the import-dominated West Coast market.

A 30-second TV spot that will air on West Coast network feeds starting Jan. 13 is almost as unusual as the guarantee itself—it names the Toyota Camry and Honda Accord, chief competitors for Olds' new compact sedan and coupe.

A customer has up to 30 days or 1,500 miles to return the Achieva and buy another vehicle to qualify for his money back.

Olds agency Leo Burnett USA, Chicago and Southfield, Mich., prepared both the national and West Coast-only advertising, said Michael Grimaldi, the division's general marketing manager.

National advertising includes two other :30s, one focusing on the car and the second on a $199-a-month lease program. Those two spots also break on the West Coast, then go national in mid-February.

"This will boldly and directly challenge the import market," said J. Michael Losh, Oldsmobile VP-general manager, who revealed the West Coast marketing plans at the Los Angeles Auto Show last week.

Cars like the Camry and Accord have cut deeply into Oldsmobile's sales volume, especially in California.

Achieva's national and regional advertising will feature the line "Never has so much thought gone into this much fun." Ads will retain Oldsmobile's overall theme, "The power of intelligent engineering."

Some observers are skeptical Oldsmobile can win the battle in California.

"That market, that's so committed to the imports, isn't going to slow down long enough to look at an Oldsmobile," said Jim Wangers, senior managing partner at Automotive Marketing Consultants. He added that the Achieva would fare better positioned against domestic competition.

Officials from GM's six vehicle-selling divisions have been meeting to forge a California strategy, with an important component being the identification of "core products" with a potential for increasing sales at the expense of import competitors (AA, Nov. 18).

GM had 28.7% of California vehicle sales in the first nine months of 1991, lagging behind the company's national share by about 7 points. Mr. Grimaldi said Oldsmobile has about a 3% share of the California market, more than 2 points less than the division's national share. □

Dec. good for discounters

By Ira Teinowitz

It was a ghost of Christmas past for department stores, as discount and some specialty stores got most of the holiday shopping goodies.

December sales figures, released last week, show Wal-Mart Stores' same-store sales surged 5% last month over December 1990 and that Kmart Corp. saw same-store sales rise 4%.

But same-store sales at Sears, Roebuck & Co. slipped 1.8% for the month. Sears said the U.S. portion of its business fell 0.6% in December, compared with December 1990, but grew 3.6% for the full November-December holiday season.

Among other chains reporting declines: Woolworth Corp., down 0.5% based on same-store sales; May Department Stores Co., down 1%; and Ann Taylor Stores, down 8.9% (including its leased shoe departments, and down 4% without the leased department).

"Stores have divided into two groups," said Kurt Barnard, president and publisher of Barnard's Retail Marketing Report. "The upscale stores have taken it on the chin. For them, it was not a very merry Christmas. But the second tier of retailers did better, and some moderate-price retailers came through with fireworks."

Mr. Barnard pointed to the 20% increase in sales reported by discounter Dollar General Corp., the 15.8% increase by the 50-off Stores and to the Gap's 14% increase in sales.

Other retailers reported minimal increases in sales, with J.C. Penney Co. up 0.4% at its department stores, though its catalog and drugstores raised the figure to 1.4%. Dayton Hudson Corp. reported sales grew 1.5%, though the company said the 6% growth in sales at its Target Stores discount chain far outpaced the 1% growth of sales in its department store division. Target's Mervyn's division reported an 8% de-

The Advertising FACT BOOK

Change is only constant in key AA business lists

By R. Craig Endicott

Charts invariably become dated the moment they're sent to the printer. So each chart presented in The Advertising Fact Book has been updated where necessary.

In updating the 100 Media Companies chart, Family Media was excluded, making room for former No. 101 Ackerley Communications. Family Media literally shuttered its offices as the 100 Top Media Companies ranking was issued in August.

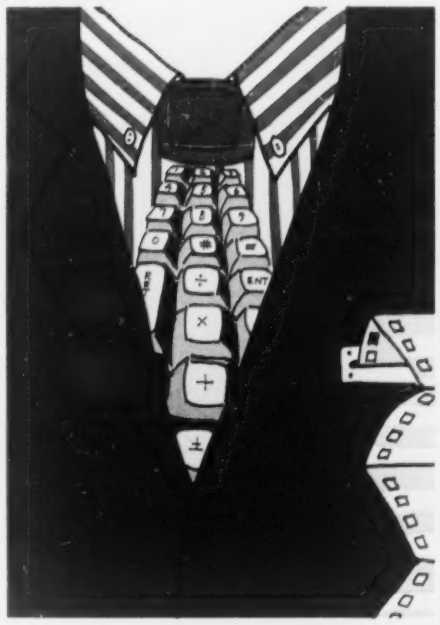
Family Media's closure led to the death of its 1,001 Home Ideas, ranked No. 71 in revenues last June among the nation's magazines. Eliminating the title from the Top 100 made room for Advance Publications' HG Magazine.

New agencies entered the Top 200 agency brands chart to fill a vacuum left by Levine, Huntley, Vick & Beaver, the 34th largest U.S. ad agency that dissolved in late 1991, and former No. 196 Winius Brandon, bought by No. 146 Fogarty & Klein and now called Fogarty & Klein/Winius Brandon.

Other agencies just changed names, sometimes reflecting new affiliations.

In the case of mergers, no numbers were joined to trigger new rankings in the edited charts because the whole of a new company is rarely equal to the sum of its merged parts.

Other than providing a more current reading, a snapshot at the mid-life cycle of charts issued annually can project anticipated changes in future rankings.



Mike Quon/The Image Bank

Particularly revealing is the jockeying for position by media companies under way. Two are under bankruptcy reorganization protection, No. 49 Gillett Holdings and No. 55 Maxwell Communication Corp. Their positions are in jeopardy should properties be sold to pay creditors.

Two of the world's largest advertising organizations—No. 7 Eurocom Group and its former antagonist, No. 14 Roux Seguela Cayzac & Goudard, both Paris-based—have beaten their swords into plowshares and merged. The resulting unit could move ahead of Young & Rubicam into the No. 6 spot.

An added benefit of the Fact Book is that it offers the luxury of space to present numbers in new ways. The chart on the 100 Leading National Advertisers addresses U.S. sales as an expression of U.S. ad spending—an analysis not present in the September issue.

For example, No. 1 advertiser Procter & Gamble Co. drew sales of $6.70 in 1990 per $1 invested in advertising, down from $8.30 the year before. Wal-Mart Stores, No. 70 in total ad spending, generated $214.90 per ad dollar in 1990, up from $203.10. One could read into such ratios the growing marketing power of the retailer.

But the Fact Book, even in its updated and expanded version, is still but a thumbprint in time. The top five agencies, media companies and national advertisers today weren't the same set of companies five years ago, rendering change the only promise of any ranking. □

Today, consumers read labels.
Today's consumers are careful consumers. They investigate, shop, and compare. They demand to know what goes into things, and who's behind them.
They look for the names and products they can trust. Like Fruit of the Loom® and Screen Stars® Best™ shirts.
They know they can count on us for extra comfort, fit, and the industry's highest quality. And the most competitive prices.
Consumers know how to recognize superior value. They just look for the labels. Our labels.

Package goods marketing vs. Hollywood

By Joel Hochberg

There are valuable lessons that package goods marketers can learn from movie marketers. One aspect of movie marketing I have long admired is the sense of urgency, the call to action in the best movie advertising. There's a "Try me right now, don't wait" attitude that seems lacking in much of the package goods advertising we see.

Publicity, another area in which movie marketers excel, tends to be overlooked or downplayed by package goods marketers. Months before a movie advertising campaign reaches consumers, the publicity mill is grinding away, creating anticipation and interest in the upcoming product. While the movie "Hook," for example, may be inherently more interesting than a new cereal, there are many publicity opportunities to be explored and exploited for that cereal.

Conversely, there are major lessons that movie marketers can learn from their package goods cousins. Perhaps the key lesson is the importance and necessity of strategic focus. Developing relevant and persuasive selling strategies is a major strength of successful package goods marketers.

A movie is a product, not unlike a cake mix or a beer. The marketing of these products, whether it's "Terminator 2" or Green Giant peas, requires the employment of the same basic disciplines. You do research—product research, consumer research. You develop a laserlike strategic platform. You identify your target audience. You decide what you're going to say as well as how and where you're going to say it. You create advertising materials that involve your customer and elevate your movies, or can of peas, above its competition. You select media that will effectively and efficiently reach your audience. And all during the process, you stay close to your potential customers, constantly trying to find out what they're thinking about your product and your advertising.

So much for some of the broad similarities between marketing movies and other products. On to some major differences.

The main goal in marketing a movie is to cause transactions (millions and millions of transactions): to sell tickets to a specific movie on a certain Friday or Saturday night. Package goods competition is fierce, but movie competition, because of any movie's fragile and temporary nature, is even fiercer. The moviegoer has lots of choices to make on a Friday or Saturday night. If they don't choose your movie in sufficient numbers, your movie won't be around too long.

With a new product in a supermarket, you have considerably more time to gauge failure or success. Package goods, unlike movies, not only require immediate transactions, but repeat purchases as well.

The ingredients in a movie are considerably different; in place of flour, sugar and hexachlorophene are stories, stars and directors. The latter ingredients are not only more fragile, but also more highly combustible than a product in a package.

For the most part, the quality of movies is much more variable as well. A bag of potato chips or a jar of peanut butter must meet certain specifications, contain specific ingredients. Movies, however, are highly subjective. The quality varies widely, thus the frustration and challenge of movie marketing.

With most consumer goods, pricing varies, depending on size and contents. A totally-loaded Mercedes is priced differently than a bottom-of-the-line Hyundai. But moviegoers pay the same going rate to see "The Addams Family" or a low-budget movie made by unknowns and starring unknowns. Which makes marketing that "unknown" movie very challenging.

There are few real "brands" in the movie business. The only studio with any conumer leverage is Disney, especially with their animated productions. Certain directors have become brands, such as Hitchcock, Spielberg and John Hughes, because—as with most brands—there is a familiarity and consistency to their product.

Movies such as "Home Alone," "Terminator" and "Star Trek" have become brands because of their success and the strong brand attributes they contain and project. When it comes to sequels, however, you don't want to vary your original recipe to any great degree. It's usually advantageous to use the same people who made the first movie. The challenge (in production and marketing), much as it is with brand extensions, is to freshen up the original product and offer something new, without making it a totally different product.

Finally, why is it that with so many bright and talented people in movie and package goods marketing, there aren't more successes? The answer may lie in the last line of the movie, "Some Like It Hot," delivered by Joe E. Brown: "Well, nobody's perfect." □

Mr. Hochberg recently left as president of domestic theatrical marketing at 20th Century Fox Film Corp. "after one year and 25 movies." Previously, he was president of DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago.

CPMs must bow to 'involvement' measurement

By Kevin J. Clancy

Marketers have purchased advertising time on television based on cost per thousand for the last 30 years. We say CPMs are no longer relevant.

We base this statement on our research designed to answer this long-debated question: Will the same commercial placed in two different TV programs that have the same viewership and the same audience profiles generate a different response based on viewer involvement?

The "negative effects hypothesis" says that the more viewers are involved in a television program, the weaker they respond to commercials. A strong program sucks the life out of the commercials.

The "positive effects theory" says involving programs produce engaged respondents who demonstrate more favorable responses to advertising messages. The more involving the program, the more positive the ad response.

Over the last 30 years, more than 30 research studies testing media environment effects turned up evidence for both positions. Researchers however, used different methodologies. And most of the studies measured recall only, not a full range of advertising response indicators.

We decided to design a research and development study that would overcome these drawbacks, beginning with three hypotheses:

- One can measure "program involvement" reliably and validly.
- Involvement is positively related to advertising response. The greater the viewer's involvement in a program, the stronger the effects of the advertising shown in that program.
- The cost per thousand people "involved" (CPMI) is different from the cost per thousand people exposed (CPM) to advertising.

We exposed 470 randomly selected female heads of household to programs and commercials in conditions that mirrored normal in-home viewing conditions as closely as possible.

For our program involvement measure we asked for their degree of agreement or disagreement with 30 statements that identify cognitive, emotionally based, behavioral and mood-altering reactions to different programs. Examples:

"This program was a cut above the average TV show—it was thought-provoking as well as entertaining."

"There were parts of this show that really touched my feelings."

"I was really involved in the program. By the end, I wished it had lasted longer."

While we measured many advertising response variables, the five key ones were unaided recall, aided copy point recall, credibility for each message recalled, purchase interest and pre/post buying intention changes. As the table shows, "program involvement" had a significant positive effect on all those ad response measures. The pre/post buying intention changes are, we believe, the most important. (See Table 1.)

Table 1: Advertising response for four test commercials (by program involvement)

	Program involvement
	Low	Moderate	High
Unaided recall	18.4%	21.0%	22.2%
Aided recall	34.0%	48.0%	54.0%
Copy point credibility	24.0%	37.0%	41.0%
Purchase interest	13.2%	15.7%	17.9%
Pre/post behavioral change	6.4%	12.6%	14.4%

Since program involvement strongly influences ad response, knowing this effect can aid a campaign's success. But do programs vary in involvement? We calculated "program involvement" scores for 40 different programs and found that they do. The highest score (on a four-point scale) was 3.42; the lowest was 1.7.

We also found that not all programs with high viewership have high involvement. That could affect media-buying decisions.

Table 2: Top 10 programs based on CPMI

Program no.	CPMI
17	$10.92
19	$12.07
5	$12.43
36	$12.78
18	$12.91
35	$13.19
12	$13.51
40	$13.67
25	$14.08
9	$14.52
Average	$13.61

In the first chart (see Table 2) we ranked the top 10 of the 40 programs in the common cost-per-thousand terms, using syndicated data.

We then indexed the 40 programs in terms of "program involvement"—based on our survey of the 470 female heads of household—and calculated a new measure, CPMI. For example, Program 17 had an involvement score of 2.28, while the average for all 40 programs was 2.38. Program 17, therefore, had an involvement index of 0.96. Dividing Program 17's CPM of $10.92 by 0.96 gives an estimated CPMI of $11.38. (See Table 3.)

Note that there is some correlation between CPMs and CPMIs; six of the top 10 programs in each list are the same (Nos. 9, 17, 18, 19, 36 and 40). On the other hand, four programs are different. The correlation between CPM rank and CPMI rank across all 40 programs is 0.69.

We found that the average indexed involvement score for the top ranked CPMI programs is 1.30 (30% above average) while the average involvement scores for the top 10 CPM programs is 1.06, a 23% difference. Thus the CPMI approach identifies programs that are much higher in involvement and, consequently, higher in predicted advertising effectiveness.

We believe that the calculation of CPMIs based on serious research and/or expert judgment should become a regular part of television (and print and radio) buying. Since our experience suggests there is far more variability in involvement between shows than between episodes of a show, we believe only four measurements of involvement per program per year would be sufficient to track involvement levels. This procedure could be adapted, we believe, to all types of shows including news shows and specials. □

YEAREND AD RESULTS

Titles tortured in 1991

Worst ad decline in 30 years; no relief in sight

By Scott Donaton

Magazine ad pages in 1991 suffered their steepest decline in 30 years, and publishers say there are no signs of recovery on the horizon.

MEDIA WORKS

The 164 magazines tracked by Publishers Information Bureau carried 156,650 ad pages for the year, a drop of 8.7% from 1990, when ad pages fell 3.7%. The final 1991 figures are a far cry from 1989, when magazines carried a record 177,000 ad pages.

The 8.7% drop is the steepest decline since 1961, when ad pages were down 8.9%, and the third-largest decline since PIB began tracking ad pages in 1950. Ad pages fell 14.1% in 1958.

Magazine ad revenues declined 3% to $6.5 billion in 1991, PIB reported. But those figures don't include discounts given to advertisers by magazines, meaning the actual revenue performance was probably worse.

Overall, 71% of the publications tracked by PIB posted page declines last year; only 46 posted gains. Conde Nast Publications' Allure, launched last March, ended the year with 287.7 ad pages. Two dozen titles saw pages drop more than 20%.

Publishers say 1992 isn't off to a better start, and most shy away from predicting when a full-scale recovery will begin. First-quarter results were bleak for many titles, and industry observers said they expect ad pages to be flat or up slightly at best for the year.

When he announced the closing of NewYork Woman earlier this month, American Express Publishing Corp. President Thomas O. Ryder said: "It became apparent a turn in the economy was not in place or foreseeable."

Hearst Corp. folded its upscale Connoisseur the same week, sparking industry speculation that a new wave of shakeouts is under way. More than 40 magazines have folded since the ad decline began in late 1989.

Nearly every category was squeezed by the industrywide decline, but among the worst hit were weeklies, upscale titles and women's books. Those beating the odds were tightly focused niche titles like American Heritage and Outside. Time Warner's fledgling Entertainment Weekly saw pages rise 16.6% to 1,056.4.

Business Week led all magazines in ad pages for the 16th consecutive year, despite a 15.3% ad page drop to 3,735. Forbes—which led the ad page race several times this year due in part to a strong showing from its quarterly FYI supplement—finished the year with 3,572.6 pages, down 9.4%. Fortune finished third among the Big 3 business books with 2,949.6 pages, down 12.2%.

Among newsweeklies, U.S. News & World Report moved into second place in ad pages for the first time, passing Newsweek. U.S. News' 2,023.4 pages were up 0.6% from last year. Newsweek carried 1,951.7 pages, down 15.2%. Category leader Time saw pages drop a steep 20.6% to 2,167.

Magazines aimed at affluent audiences last year shattered the myth that they're recession-proof.

Architectural Digest's 1,288.3 ad pages were down 29.3%. Town & Country's pages fell 27.8% to 1,159.9. Art & Antiques, with 541.7 pages, was down 34.3%.

Vanity Fair, on the strength of a solid second-half performance, ended the year down just 2.2% with 1,440.3 pages.

The four Sunday magazines tracked by PIB carried a combined 5,424.4 ad pages, a decline of 13%. Hardest hit was The New York Times Magazine, which saw pages fall 23% to 2,872.8. The Los Angeles Times magazine carried 1,118.4 pages, a gain of 4.2%.

Parade led the way in the national Sunday magazine field with 752 ad pages, up 1.6%, while USA Weekend, with 680.2 pages, was down a scant 0.8%. □

COVER STORY

Roberts reigns on covers

By Janice Kelly

Everyone's hooked on Hollywood's latest Tinkerbell, Julia Roberts.

Ms. Roberts left other celebrities in a trail of stardust to become the person most featured on magazine covers in 1991.

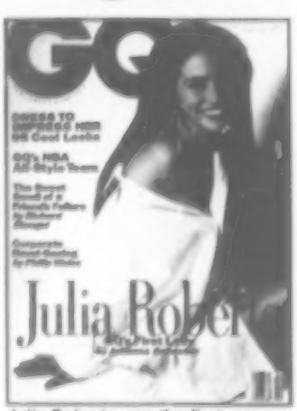
She topped the fifth annual Cover Story survey with appearances on more than 30 magazines. That led the late Michael Landon, who finished second, and Operation Desert Storm, which captured third place.

Cover Story assigns point values to cover appearances based on such factors as prominence of the photo and frequency of the publication.

The National Association of Theatre Owners named Ms. Roberts "Star of the Year," and Premiere ranked her as Hollywood's most powerful woman.

Ms. Roberts ended the year with 54 Cover Story points, topping the monthly survey twice.

Like 1990 winner Madonna, Ms. Roberts started the year slowly. But attention heated up in July when she called off her wedding to Kiefer Sutherland. The breakup left Ladies' Home Journal out there with Ms. Roberts on the cover, captioned "Julia in love."



Julia Roberts was the first woman to ever grace a cover of GQ.

Ms. Roberts, 23, was the first woman ever to grace the cover of GQ, in February.

Mr. Landon, who died in July after a battle with cancer, earned 50 points for the year. January coverage of Operation Desert Storm earned a landslide 46 points.

Fourth place with 36.5 points went to Kevin Costner, lauded for his Oscar-winning "Dances With Wolves." Former "Designing Women" star Delta Burke grabbed fifth place with 35.5 points for stories about her weight and personal life.

Rounding out the top 10 were Oprah Winfrey (33 points), Jodie Foster (27.5), President Bush (25.5), Nancy Reagan (25) and Elizabeth Taylor (24).

Cover editors expect Annette Bening, Keanu Reeves, Madonna, Arnold Schwarzenegger and Roseanne Arnold to be hot cover candidates for 1992. □

CBS fights back

Gloria Estefan to star in Super Bowl show

By Joe Mandese

CBS-TV will try to prevent viewers from tuning away from its halftime coverage of Super Bowl XXVI with a special performance by pop star Gloria Estefan.

Fox Broadcasting Co. earlier announced it would air counter-programming to the Jan. 26 event at halftime, apparently forcing the CBS countermove.

Fox will air a special live episode of its hit prime-time series "In Living Color" at that time.

Last week, Fox said it will counterprogram the CBS/Estefan halftime performance with a live performance by a major recording artist, to be named this week.

"The halftime performer that Fox has offers a very distinctive choice that is on the other end of the spectrum from Gloria Estefan," said Jay Coleman, president of Entertainment Marketing & Communications International. "It will be a performer that fits the profile of Fox and 'In Living Color.' "

Mr. Coleman said the promotion and advertising efforts for the Fox show, to be targeted at teens and young adults, will be the biggest ever for a one-time TV entertainment special.

"They can claim anything they want, but it's more of an example of promotion by press release," said George Schweitzer, senior VP-marketing and communications at CBS. "They're not even on seven nights a week. Our CBS daytime schedule reaches more people than all of their shows except three."

■ New study says media weight has little to do with effectiveness of Super Bowl spots—Page 21.

CBS' Super Bowl halftime show will feature a winter sports theme that will serve as a platform for the network's coverage of the 1992 Winter Olympics. It was unclear how Ms. Estefan's performance will be integrated into the show.

"The Super Bowl is the biggest television event of the year, and all of the amount of Fox promotion won't make a difference," Mr. Schweitzer said.

The Fox effort will break this week with an estimated $1 million radio campaign by Frito-Lay, via Tracy-Locke, Dallas, to be followed by in-store displays, newspaper inserts and ads targeted at children on Whittle Communications' "Channel One" school TV program.

Fox's on-air promotion effort will appear during the two weeks preceding the Super Bowl.

The Fox special, dubbed "Doritos Zaptime/The 'In Living Color' Super Halftime Party," is the first major effort ever to counterprogram Super Bowl halftime coverage.

"We're pretty confident that we have a good chance of getting people to switch," Mr. Coleman said, "because the halftime show has never really been designed for a television audience." □

Olds backs new Achieva with buy-back guarantee

By Raymond Serafin and Cleveland Horton

Oldsmobile will take the unprecedented step of offering to buy back its new Achieva from West Coast customers if they decide they'd rather buy a different car, even from a competitor.

That shows the extraordinary steps General Motors Corp. is willing to take to begin making inroads into the import-dominated West Coast market.

A 30-second TV spot that will air on West Coast network feeds starting Jan. 13 is almost as unusual as the guarantee itself—it names the Toyota Camry and Honda Accord, chief competitors for Olds' new compact sedan and coupe.

A customer has up to 30 days or 1,500 miles to return the Achieva and buy another vehicle to qualify for his money back.

Olds agency Leo Burnett USA, Chicago and Southfield, Mich., prepared both the national and West Coast-only advertising, said Michael Grimaldi, the division's general marketing manager.

National advertising includes two other :30s, one focusing on the car and the second on a $199-a-month lease program. Those two spots also break on the West Coast, then go national in mid-February.

"This will boldly and directly challenge the import market," said J. Michael Losh, Oldsmobile VP-general manager, who revealed the West Coast marketing plans at the Los Angeles Auto Show last week.

Cars like the Camry and Accord have cut deeply into Oldsmobile's sales volume, especially in California.

Achieva's national and regional advertising will feature the line "Never has so much thought gone into this much fun." Ads will retain Oldsmobile's overall theme, "The power of intelligent engineering."

Some observers are skeptical Oldsmobile can win the battle in California.

"That market, that's so committed to the imports, isn't going to slow down long enough to look at an Oldsmobile," said Jim Wangers, senior managing partner at Automotive Marketing Consultants. He added that the Achieva would fare better positioned against domestic competition.

Officials from GM's six vehicle-selling divisions have been meeting to forge a California strategy, with an important component being the identification of "core products" with a potential for increasing sales at the expense of import competitors (AA, Nov. 18).

GM had 28.7% of California vehicle sales in the first nine months of 1991, lagging behind the company's national share by about 7 points. Mr. Grimaldi said Oldsmobile has about a 3% share of the California market, more than 2 points less than the division's national share. □

Dec. good for discounters

By Ira Teinowitz

It was a ghost of Christmas past for department stores, as discount and some specialty stores got most of the holiday shopping goodies.

December sales figures, released last week, show Wal-Mart Stores' same-store sales surged 5% last month over December 1990 and that Kmart Corp. saw same-store sales rise 4%.

But same-store sales at Sears, Roebuck & Co. slipped 1.8% for the month. Sears said the U.S. portion of its business fell 0.6% in December, compared with December 1990, but grew 3.6% for the full November-December holiday season.

Among other chains reporting declines: Woolworth Corp., down 0.5% based on same-store sales; May Department Stores Co., down 1%; and Ann Taylor Stores, down 8.9% (including its leased shoe departments, and down 4% without the leased department).

"Stores have divided into two groups," said Kurt Barnard, president and publisher of Barnard's Retail Marketing Report. "The upscale stores have taken it on the chin. For them, it was not a very merry Christmas. But the second tier of retailers did better, and some moderate-price retailers came through with fireworks."

Mr. Barnard pointed to the 20% increase in sales reported by discounter Dollar General Corp., the 15.8% increase by the 50-off Stores and to the Gap's 14% increase in sales.

Other retailers reported minimal increases in sales, with J.C. Penney Co. up 0.4% at its department stores, though its catalog and drugstores raised the figure to 1.4%. Dayton Hudson Corp. reported sales grew 1.5%, though the company said the 6% growth in sales at its Target Stores discount chain far outpaced the 1% growth of sales in its department store division. Target's Mervyn's division reported an 8% de-

The Advertising BOOK FACTS

Change is only constant in key AA business lists

By R. Craig Endicott

Charts invariably become dated the moment they're sent to the printer. So each chart presented in The Advertising Fact Book has been updated where necessary.

In updating the 100 Media Companies chart, Family Media was excluded, making room for former No. 101 Ackerley Communications. Family Media literally shuttered its offices as the 100 Top Media Companies ranking was issued in August.

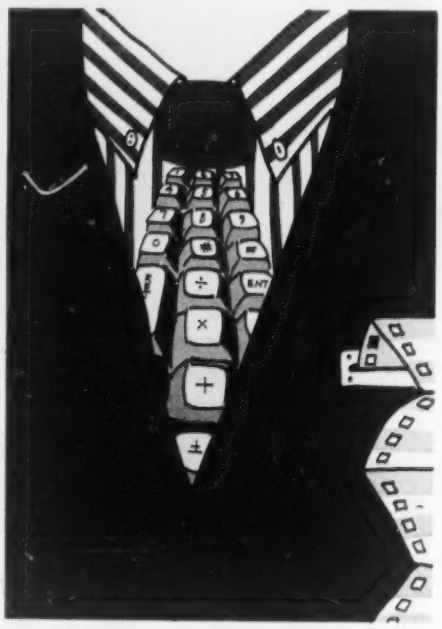
Family Media's closure led to the death of its 1,001 Home Ideas, ranked No. 71 in revenues last June among the nation's magazines. Eliminating the title from the Top 100 made room for Advance Publications' HG Magazine.

New agencies entered the Top 200 agency brands chart to fill a vacuum left by Levine, Huntley, Vick & Beaver, the 34th largest U.S. ad agency that dissolved in late 1991, and former No. 196 Winius Brandon, bought by No. 146 Fogarty & Klein and now called Fogarty & Klein/Winius Brandon.

Other agencies just changed names, sometimes reflecting new affiliations.

In the case of mergers, no numbers were joined to trigger new rankings in the edited charts because the whole of a new company is rarely equal to the sum of its merged parts.

Other than providing a more current reading, a snapshot at the mid-life cycle of charts issued annually can project anticipated changes in future rankings.



Mike Quon/The Image Bank

Particularly revealing is the jockeying for position by media companies under way. Two are under bankruptcy reorganization protection, No. 49 Gillett Holdings and No. 55 Maxwell Communication Corp. Their positions are in jeopardy should properties be sold to pay creditors.

Two of the world's largest advertising organizations—No. 7 Eurocom Group and its former antagonist, No. 14 Roux Seguela Cayzac & Goudard, both Paris-based—have beaten their swords into plowshares and merged. The resulting unit could move ahead of Young & Rubicam into the No. 6 spot.

An added benefit of the Fact Book is that it offers the luxury of space to present numbers in new ways. The chart on the 100 Leading National Advertisers addresses U.S. sales as an expression of U.S. ad spending—an analysis not present in the September issue.

For example, No. 1 advertiser Procter & Gamble Co. drew sales of $6.70 in 1990 per $1 invested in advertising, down from $8.30 the year before. Wal-Mart Stores, No. 70 in total ad spending, generated $214.90 per ad dollar in 1990, up from $203.10. One could read into such ratios the growing marketing power of the retailer.

But the Fact Book, even in its updated and expanded version, is still but a thumbprint in time. The top five agencies, media companies and national advertisers today weren't the same set of companies five years ago, rendering change the only promise of any ranking. □

Disney to buy magazine

By Scott Donaton

Walt Disney Co., making good on its promise to become a player in consumer magazine publishing, is close to acquiring 8-month-old FamilyFun from founding Publisher-Editor Jake Winebaum and U.S. News & World Report.

The family activity magazine would be Disney Publishing Group's third title, joining the 16-month-old digest-size Disney Adventures for kids and the consumer science magazine Discover, which Disney pulled from the rubble of Family Media last September and is relaunching with the March issue.

FamilyFun was launched as a joint venture between U.S. News and Mr. Winebaum, a senior marketing executive with the newsweekly. It was published twice last year, in May and November.

Mr. Winebaum, 32, who will remain publisher of the magazine after the sale, approached a number of publishers in recent months seeking to sell all or part of the fledgling magazine, industry sources say.

He contacted Cahners Publishing Co., Reader's Digest Association and Time Warner, among others, after U.S. News owner Mortimer Zuckerman decided against further investment in FamilyFun.

Disney has been active on the magazine acquisition trail since shortly after the fall 1990 launch of Disney Adventures.

In November of that year, Disney tapped John Skipper, then president and publishing director of Spin, as VP-magazine publishing. His goal was to expand the company's portfolio of magazines through launches and acquisitions.

Disney wants eventually to publish FamilyFun 10 times a year.

Disney has said it's only interested in magazines that fit with its wholesome family image, a criterion FamilyFun meets.

The magazine is targeted to parents of 3-to-15-year-olds and focuses on family travel, entertainment and other upbeat family-related activities. It has a rate base of 200,000.

FamilyFun's third issue is due in May. Disney plans to increase its frequency first to quarterly or every-other-monthly, sources say, and eventually to 10-times-yearly.

Early advertiser reaction to FamilyFun has been fairly strong. The launch issue carried 62 ad pages; the second had 81.

U.S. marketers turn red, white & blue against Japan

By Gary Levin

Compaq Computer Corp. is advertising that a new computer comes "from the labs in Houston." Black & Decker Corp. has added an American flag-like symbol to its tools. Ads for a cadre of car dealers implore drivers to "buy American."

A new wave of American patriotism is creeping into the consumer marketplace. Fueled by President George Bush's trade mission to Japan last month, which led a Japanese politician to reportedly call Americans "lazy," "illiterate" and "subcontractors" to Japan, corporate America has begun to fight back.

American advertisers are tapping into what they see as an emerging anti-import-anything movement, and research is backing them up.

Yankelovich Clancy Shulman studies show that a majority of Americans (and especially those over 50) say they feel "guilty" about buying foreign-made products. But the rub is that many still do. When shopping for luxury cars, "my guess is that people will walk around feeling guilty, and then buy Japanese," said Kevin Clancy, chairman of the research firm.

Yet "there's little doubt in my mind . . . that the Japan-bashing coming out of Washington and other industries will change public opinion," he said. "Whether it's an ephemeral change or an enduring change, I don't know."

Few are as vitriolic as Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca, who in a 1990 TV campaign growled that "America is getting an inferiority complex about Japan," mimicking consumers' paranoia: "Everything from Japan is perfect. Everything from America is lousy," he said.

Others have tried the same tack. Recent TV spots for Crafted with Pride in the USA Council, a textile industry group, show stark scenes of unemployment lines and crates stamped "import"

P&G tries new Ultra detergents

By Jennifer Lawrence

Procter & Gamble Co. this week starts testing the first superconcentrated liquid detergents in the U.S., yet another major step in the company's aggressive new-product strategy.

Seven superconcentrated Ultra liquid detergents—under the Cheer, Era, Tide and Dash brands—will be tested simultaneously in Colorado and parts of Wyoming, Nebraska and South Dakota.

Advertising for all the products will begin in March.

P&G, the dominant player in the $3.6 billion laundry detergent category with a 55.5% share, will also test Ultra Refills of the new liquid products.

The refill bottles are lightweight, translucent milk jug-type plastic made from 50% post-consumer recycled plastic.

P&G's creation of a superconcentrated liquid segment in the U.S. market dovetails with its expansion of superconcentrated powders and the global expansion of Pampers Phases disposable diapers.

These moves will reinforce P&G's leadership position in its core markets, industry analysts say.

P&G will also test Ultra Refills of the liquids.

Chairman-CEO Edwin Artzt "has given the mandate that P&G wants to be first and that P&G, as the market leader, should lead markets in improved technology," said Andrew Shore, analyst at Prudential Securities. "Procter is leading the way at a time when others are reluctant to spend."

He added: "Almost anything Procter is doing in its big core catgories is done with global intent."

Analysts say they believe P&G has an eye on global markets for the Ultra liquid detergents and won't test them long if consumers take to the liquids as they have to the superconcentrated powders.

The new, smaller bottles with more powerful product formulas could appeal to both consumers and retailers, observers say. Consumers may find them more convenient, and retailers will be able to get more product on store shelves. P&G will benefit from selling a higher-margin product.

Also, the refill ties in to consumers' environmental concerns.

To make it easier for consumers to know when they're running out of liquid, the new Ultra bottles feature a transparent side view stripe.

The liquids will be advertised separate-

Excedrin may be headache for DDB Needham

NEW YORK—Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s Excedrin analgesic, a $25 million-plus account, is in danger of slipping away from DDB Needham Worldwide, industry sources said. DDB Needham earlier lost a creative shoot-out for Excedrin IB's introductory spot to Bozell. A second shoot-out is under way for the post-introductory period, the sources said. Contenders include the incumbent, Bozell, J. Walter Thompson USA and several unidentified agencies. "DDB Needham continues to be the agency of record for the Excedrin franchise," a Bristol-Myers spokesman said.

FDA calls retreat on drug ad guides

By Steven W. Colford and Joe Mandese

WASHINGTON—The Food & Drug Administration is backing away from its plan to issue advertising and promotional guidelines for prescription drug marketers.

Barely three months after the FDA actively solicited comments on proposed guidelines for drug company-sponsored conferences, a spokesman said the agency is now considering other alternatives and may also postpone or abandon the notion of issuing guidelines for drug advertising.

Proposed ad guidelines were expected at the end of January.

The decision to back away follows recent moves by the FDA to crack down on what it considers objectionable claims in consumer drug advertising.

Some ad agencies, drug marketers and lawyers say the FDA is using strong-arm tactics to investigate a number of drug company campaigns.

FDA investigators in the past six months have shown up at the offices of agency executives and homes of ex-agency executives in search of records related to drug campaigns, said Stuart Lee Friedel, a partner with the law firm Davis & Gilbert, New York.

Among the clients Mr. Friedel represents is Kallir, Philips, Ross, New York, which has been interrogated by FDA agents about advertising for Ortho Phamaceutical Corp.'s Retin A.

Retin A had been approved by the FDA as an anti-acne prescription treatment, but the FDA objected when the drug was promoted as an anti-aging treatment. Kallir handled those promotions.

The FDA has since turned over investigation in that year-old case to the

Nabisco acts to stop cereal share slide

By Judann Dagnoli

Nabisco Foods Group is recommitting itself to the cereal business after several years of market share erosion.

Long considered a poor sibling to Nabisco's cookies and crackers, ready-to-eat cereals, though a profit generator, have been treated as niche products worthy of sporadic marketing attention at best.

But scant ad spending and few new-product initiatives have finally taken too great a toll on Nabisco's cereal market share.

As a result, the company is now taking a "back to basics" approach to cereals that's centered on its flagship Shredded Wheat brand, said John Baumbusch, group product manager.

Starting this week, the 100-year-old cereal will be the focus of a short-term centennial consumer promotion and ad campaign that features America's perennial teen-ager, Dick Clark. A long-term image campaign is expected by yearend from FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York.

"We'll never be a Kellogg," said Mr. Baumbusch, referring to the market leader's just under 40% share of the $7 billion category. "But we'll be more of a player."

Toward that end, Nabisco merged its cereal business into the cookie/cracker division early this year. The move gives Nabisco a competitive advantage over other cereal marketers, including the use of more localized promotions, Mr. Baumbusch said. In addition, cereals now fall under the leader-

Olympic fire sale

CBS unloads inventory in last-minute deals

By Joe Mandese

The traditional premium advertisers put on Olympic ad time is evaporating due to steep discounting on CBS' coverage of the 1992 Winter Games.

Prime-time spots that had originally sold for $250,000 each have been selling for $150,000 to $175,000 in recent weeks, as CBS pulled out all stops to sell the remainder of its Olympics inventory.

"Our strategy is to sell out. Our strategy is not to take units to Albertville," said George Schweitzer, CBS senior VP-marketing and communications.

The network's coverage of the Games starts Feb. 8.

At press time, network and agency sources estimated CBS had less than 5% of its Olympic commercial inventory remaining, but the last-minute push has tarnished the Olympics' gold.

Buyers estimate the prime-time cost per thousand for Olympic buys has fallen about 47% to $8. That's about what conventional prime-time network programming during the period would cost.

"It's less than half the CPM that ABC was charging when it had the Olympics in 1988," said a buyer who made a recent Olympics deal with CBS.

Those good deals have brought in a flurry of last-minute buys by a variety of advertisers, including: American Home Products Corp., American Isuzu Motors, BMW of North America, Kraft General Foods, McDonald's Corp., Mercedes-Benz of North America, Reebok International, Texaco, Toyota Motors Sales USA's Toyota and Lexus divisions, USAir and Warner-Lambert Co.

Most of the latecomers bought smaller amounts of Olympics time that were packaged together with other CBS inventory, including sports and prime time.

A host of big upfront Olympic advertisers paid heavy premiums to be in the Games, including Anheuser-Busch Cos., Chrysler Corp., Coca-Cola Co. and Eastman Kodak Co.

OLYMPICS 1992

To bring those upfront clients in line with the rest of the marketplace, CBS was forced to upgrade the deals several times with bonus units and guarantees, and is expected to offer additional upgrades by the time the Games begin.

For at least one Olympic advertiser, Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., the average cost per 30-second spot dropped 9% since initial deals were cut.

"Let's just say we made a very good buy," said Maurice Kelley Jr., VP-marketing services at SmithKline Beecham Consumer Products Co., which bought an early Olympic package from CBS that includes about 100 commercial spots. "We believe the Olympics are worth some premium, but there was some negotiation. I'd prefer to say we're comfortable."

Olympic deals have gotten so good that Anheuser-Busch last week made an incremental buy on the network to launch a sep-

Couponing reaches record clip

By Scott Hume

A dramatic and surprising increase in coupon distribution and use in 1991 is expected to continue in 1992, two monitoring organizations reported.

Signaling a growing price consciousness among consumers, the trend could mean trouble for premium-price products and create opportunities for discount retailers, the groups say.

Product marketers distributed a record 292 billion cents-off coupons last year, reported Dun & Bradstreet Corp.'s NCH Promotional Services, and consumers redeemed nearly 7.5 billion of them, another record.

The number of coupons distributed, including both the grocery and health & beauty aids categories, represented a 4.5% increase, relatively unchanged from the 4.4% increase in 1990. But distribution was expected to have plateaued rather than grown.

CMS, another coupon management company, had predicted in mid-1991 that full-year distribution would be up less than 1%. But its yearend tabulation showed distribution had risen 12%.

That suggests product marketers greatly increased couponing during the second half of the year as consumer spending fell and marketers sought short-term incentives to drive sales and meet volume goals.

Even with the rise in the number of coupons, both monitoring organizations determined redemption rose 5%. That was unexpected, given the 0.6% decline in redemption during 1990, according to NCH data.

"Consumers . . . saw coupons as a way to save money, and they used them," said Jane Perrin, NCH senior VP-marketing. "Redemption was up more than we anticipated.

"We expect these trends to continue. 1992 is going to show consumers using even more coupons unless the economy gets better quickly.

"Manufacturers should be looking

Campbell Soup Co. thinks desserts will make its new line of kids meals stand out.

Campbell finally sets kids meals

By Judann Dagnoli

Campbell Soup Co. is entering a product category that executives said it never would: frozen meals for kids.

New Swanson Fun Feast is a latecomer to a burgeoning segment dominated by two fairly entrenched players, ConAgra Frozen Foods Co.'s Banquet Kid Cuisine and Tyson Foods' Looney Tunes.

The network TV campaign for Fun Feast breaks May 1 via BBDO Worldwide, New York, which won the company's estimated $25 million frozen food account earlier this year from Ogilvy & Mather.

Campbell is expected to spend $5 million to $8 million in advertising Fun Feast the first year.

"If we didn't compete, they would cannibalize our base business."

"The real opportunity in kids meals was two years ago," admitted James Van Stone, VP for Campbell's convenience meals sector. "It would have been better to have been first."

Technological problems slowed development of the line. There was also initial resistence by upper management. For example, Herb Baum, president of the Campbell North & South America unit, stated publicly in the past that kids meals wouldn't prove to be a successful category.

Campbell has now been forced into the fray to protect its Swanson brand—with a good consumer base of children—from the inroads of competitors.

"If we didn't compete, they would cannibalize our base business," Mr. Van Stone said.

While Fun Feast is similar to the competitive offerings, Campbell believes the brand's advantage is its desserts.

Available in eight varieties, including the frozen dairy dessert Arctic Freeze, the treats lift out of the food tray before microwaving.

The line's main meals, aimed at kids ages 6 to 11, are

The $72M question:

How much Rover ad work will new agency get?

By Elena Bowes

LONDON—Rover Group is considering moving as much as $72 million in European Rover car advertising business to Kudos Marketing, a new agency being set up independently by Rover's marketing director.

Rover, a British Aerospace unit, wants to consolidate all its advertising and below-the-line services, said Mike Kennedy, Rover's external affairs director.

Backer Spielvogel Bates Europe handles Rover creative across Europe, centrally coordinated by BSB Dorland here. Zenith Media Buying Services handles media buying.

"There's a stronger likelihood that the U.K. account will go to Kudos than the [entire] European account," Mr. Kennedy said. The U.K. portion is estimated at $36 million.

Mr. Kennedy said the decision whether to move the entire European Rover car account is up to Kevin Morley, who will head the new agency and retain the title of managing director-Rover marketing. He was unavailable for comment.

Rover is supporting Mr. Morley's venture because "we believe it's more useful to have under one roof all the agency services that are currently under six or seven roofs. By having them all centralized, the interface between them is much more effective than having them supervised from separate groups," Mr. Kennedy said. "We also will save money."

"It's more useful to have under one roof all the agency services."

Kudos will be majority owned by Mr. Morley, and a decision on whether Rover or British Aerospace will take any equity will be made within the next few weeks, Mr. Kennedy said.

Mr. Morley has had discussions with Jack Rubins, the former chairman of McCann-Erickson UK, about joining Kudos, but it's not clear in what capacity. Mr. Rubins said he's considering joining Kudos but that he will continue with SMS, a design, production and ad agency that he owns.

Kudos will provide advertising, direct marketing, promotion and merchandising services to Rover, Mr. Kennedy said. It will be available to handle other clients as long as they don't conflict with the Rover business.

BSB Dorland officials wouldn't comment on the potential account loss. The European network is expected to keep the estimated $38 million European Land Rover account.

"The present thinking is that Land Rover will stay where it is for the short-term future," Mr. Kennedy said. He expressed satisfaction with BSB Dorland's work but said: "We think this move is better for Rover in terms of focus and cost-effectiveness." □

Cable ranks high in quality

By Alison Fahey and Joe Mandese

TV viewers increasingly rate the quality of cable programming ahead of that of the broadcast networks, according to a study by Lintas:USA.

In "TV '92," an annual survey gauging consumers' attitudes toward TV, 34% of respondents said cable TV programming was "somewhat or much better" than the same period a year ago, while 27% said the same about broadcast TV. The survey, conducted in October, asked respondents to rate the quality of programming during the previous month.

This is the first time cable has pulled ahead in the report since the 1988 broadcast TV writers strike.

In "TV '91," 30% of the respondents perceived both broadcast and cable TV networks as improving their programs. And in the 1990 report, 26% of the respondents said they perceived both media as improving programming.

"The key point here is the disparity between broadcast and cable and the increase in perception of cable programming," said Bernard Guggenheim, Lintas senior VP-director of media information services.

However, he said, even though fewer respondents gave favorable reviews to broadcast TV, the change wasn't significant enough to signal a trend.

The study was based on telephone interviews with 500 randomly selected consumers 18 years and over. Margin of error was plus or minus 3.7 percentage points.

Viewers are still concerned about program content, the study found. Forty-six percent of the respondents said they were "upset with advertisers [buying time on] offensive programs." That's up from 38% and 40% in the '91 and '90 reports, respectively.

One out of every five respondents took action against advertisers, the survey indicated, by boycotting prod-

Nestle, ABC strike Taster's Choice deal

By Bradley Johnson and Joe Mandese

ABC will soon unveil the next episode of the Sharon and Tony melodrama, but it's not a TV show. This is a commercial for Taster's Choice.

Nestle Beverage Co. signed an agreement making ABC the lead network for the next of the coffee spots, featuring the coquettish carryings-on of two neighbors played by Sharon Maughan and Anthony Head.

The fourth spot in the much-publicized series will make its debut the last week of February or first week of March, depending on ABC's movie schedules, said Stuart Klein, VP-management representative at Taster's Choice agency McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York.

ABC will promote the spot on its two soap opera 900-numbers and run an ad at a discounted rate in Episodes, its soap every-other-monthly, Mr. Klein said.

Nestle, in turn, will plug ABC through supermarket point-of-purchase displays, ads in TV Guide and a public relations campaign hyping the spot, he said. This will be the third time the Taster's Choice spots have received "tune-in" support in TV Guide.

The deal is based on Nestle's

Will the Taster's Choice neighbors get together? Viewers will find out on ABC.

commitment to an incremental ad buy on ABC for the rest of the 1991-92 TV season, said Harry Factor, ABC's VP-promotional sales.

"We will work together on some other ideas throughout 1992 that will bring the consumer closer to Tony and Sharon," he said. But ABC plans no on-air component beyond the ad time bought for Taster's Choice.

ABC will get the lion's share of TV spending for Taster's Choice through summer, and that's likely to be the case again next fall when the fifth spot is unveiled, Mr. Klein said.

Nestle went with ABC after hearing proposals from the three major networks. However, Mr. Klein said the network didn't cut its rates to get the business.

ABC ranks third in the overall network ratings but has the biggest female audience in early morning and daytime programs, key targets for Taster's Choice.

The effort is adapted from a campaign created by McCann's London office for Nestle's Brown Gold coffee in the U.K.

In the last spot seen in the U.S., Tony runs into Sharon at a dinner party. The new episode just might be a date with destiny, or at least Sharon. But Mr. Klein isn't about to spill the beans just yet. □

ABC won't shift sales strategy

By Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—ABC will stick with its traditional approach to network ad sales following a reorganization by Marvin Goldsmith, the newly appointed president of sales and marketing.

Industry observers had speculated ABC might follow rival CBS' lead and adopt a multiple-daypart team approach to sales. Changes in the way several major advertisers have structured their network TV buying assignments fueled that speculation.

But ABC will retain its daypart sales structure, in which individual specialists sell time for specific dayparts, Mr. Goldsmith said.

"Philosophically, we have been very happy with the way the system has operated," he said.

He said, however, that the network—historically characterized by advertisers as rigid and inflexible in its approach to ad sales—will become more "advertiser-friendly."

Mr. Goldsmith was promoted last month from senior VP-general sales manager to president, a new title he said reflects the sales department's new status within the network. He succeeds H. Weller "Jake" Keever, the former exec VP-sales who remains a consultant to the network.

Goldsmith

Equally as significant, Mr. Goldsmith said, was the promotion of George Cain to senior VP-network group, a post that's considered the "right-hand man" to ABC President John Sias. Mr. Cain was formerly senior VP-national sales manager.

Mr. Goldsmith said his and Mr. Cain's promotions will enable the sales department to have a bigger voice in the network's operations. Advertisers and agencies will also have a "voice" at the senior-most levels of the network, he said.

ABC's current sales system is adequate for packaging multidaypart sales, he said.

"We have very quietly done a large number of multidaypart deals," he said, "and we will continue to do so."

Mr. Goldsmith added that senior account execs who sell prime time have the authority to create packages involving other dayparts.

Moreover, he noted, ABC has a yearend bonus pool that benefits all daypart sales executives equally. Neither CBS nor NBC has such a system.

At CBS, groups of sales executives package ad sales for all of the network's dayparts simultaneously to suit advertisers' needs.

That network attributed the move to major advertisers consolidating network daypart buying assignments. Among the marketers are Procter & Gamble Co., Nestle, Eastman Kodak Co. and Mars Inc.

Mr. Goldsmith also said ABC's sales presentations will emphasize more research on the extensive reach and frequency ability of network TV, citing a 1991 study showing that seven ABC prime-time commercial units reached more people than 144 cable TV spots. □

Sega exec says there's no review of account—yet

By Cleveland Horton

Reports of Sega of America placing its $65 million account up for review are premature, says the videogame marketer's new senior VP-marketing.

A review "is certainly an alternative," said Ed Volkwein, but no decision about whether to start a review will be made before the American International Toy Fair later this month in New York.

"The first order of business is to undertake a strategy review, with Sega and its agencies," he said.

Published reports last week of the account going up for grabs set the telephone lines humming to Sega's Redwood Shores, Calif., headquarters as hungry agencies inquired about the possibility of a review. Agency sources say the calls were returned by President-CEO Tom Kalinske's secretary.

"I'm a little concerned that the business is split up."

Her message to the inquiries: Thanks, but no thanks—yet.

Bozell, Los Angeles, currently handles advertising for the Genesis videogame console, while Della Femina, McNamee handles the Game Gear portable unit.

Mr. Volkwein said both are "fine agencies," but expressed some concern about using more than one shop.

"I'm a little concerned that the business is split up," he said. "We're looking for a unified brand approach, and that's difficult with two agencies."

Mr. Volkwein, who assumes the new post today, previously was president of Funk & Wagnalls Corp.

Sega is reviewing its public relations account, now at Ketchum Public Relations, San Francisco. Ketchum will participate, said Ellen Beth Van Buskirk, Sega director of marketing services.

Sega, which has been a distant No. 2 to Nintendo of America in the videogame category, expected to hit nearly $6 billion in sales this year. But Sega ended last year with a strong showing in the new 16-bit generation of videogames. The marketer expects to double sales of its Genesis system to 3.2 million units in 1992, while it projects sales of Game Gear to rise 38% to 900,000 units. Nintendo sold 2.1 million Super Nintendo Entertainment Systems last year. □

Premium beers fall flat

Lower-price brands are big gainers in '91

By Ira Teinowitz

The two top-selling beers, Budweiser and Miller Lite, both had sales declines last year while Coors dropped out of the top 10 altogether.

While those premium-price brands had problems, some popular- and subpremium-price beers posted gains.

The latest numbers from Beer Marketer's Insights confirmed some earlier predictions from Impact, though the two trade titles differ slightly on exact figures.

Both agree less beer was shipped last year than in 1990, with the drop put at 1.4% by Beer Marketer's Insights; both agree some major brands suffered.

Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser, the nation's No. 1 brew, saw shipments fall, with Beer Marketer's Insights putting the drop at 5.2%, apparently the brand's biggest drop-off in history.

Budweiser's market share dropped somewhat less but still was 0.8 points below last year's 25%. Some of Bud's losses were made up by Bud Light, which saw shipments rise 5.1%. No. 12 Bud Dry's volume dropped 6.5% to 2.9 million barrels.

Miller Brewing Co.'s Miller Lite, the nation's No. 2 brew, saw its shipments drop 4.5%. Miller High Life's long slide continued, off 14.1% and dropping it to No. 9 in the top beers.

Coors Brewing Co.'s Coors brand fell 19.5% to 3.5 million barrels, ranking it No. 11. The continued growth of Coors Light (tied with Bud Light for No. 3), up 4.9%, helped Coors recover some of the losses.

Coors was the only brewer to increase overall volume, with Beer Marketer's Insights showing the growth at 0.8%. A-B was down 0.4%, Miller was flat, Stroh Brewery Co. off 8.6%, G. Heileman Brewing Co. off 11% and Pabst off 1.5%.

The only good news in the premium-price segment was the continued growth of Miller Genuine Draft, up 10.2%, despite the industry's woes.

There was more good news for beers priced below the premium segment. A-B's Natural Light, reduced in price last year, saw shipments grow 40.6%, enough to place it among the top 10 sellers. While smaller in volume, A-B's Busch Light Draft grew 38.1% to 2.9 million barrels.

If the news wasn't great for the three biggest players in the beer industry, it was worse for two of the three lesser players.

Top 10 beer brands

Rank	Brand	Volume*	% chg	Share
1	Budweiser	47.2	−5.2	24.2%
2	Miller Lite	19.0	−4.5	9.7%
3	Coors Light	12.4	4.9	6.4%
4	Bud Light	12.4	5.1	6.4%
5	Busch	9.8	4.3	5.0%
6	Milwaukee's Best	7.1	1.4	3.6%
7	Miller Genuine Draft	6.5	10.2	3.3%
8	Old Milwaukee	5.9	−7.8	3.0%
9	Miller High Life	5.5	−14.1	2.8%
10	Natural Light	4.5	40.6	2.3%

*Volume is shipment in millions of barrels in 1991.
Source: Beer Marketer's Insights

Stroh saw every one of its major brands lose volume. Old Milwaukee dropped 7.8%, according to Beer Marketer's Insights, and Old Milwaukee Light dropped 10.5% to 1.7 million barrels, said Impact. Even Schlitz malt liquor was down 11.8% to 1.5 million barrels, according to Impact.

Heileman also experienced big drops with its flagship Old Style off 12.5% to 2.1 million barrels, and Colt 45 malt liquor down 11.1% to 1.6 million barrels, both according to Impact.

Only S&P's Corp.'s products showed gains. Pabst Blue Ribbon grew 4%, to 2.6 million barrels and its Olde English "800" malt liquor grew 30.8% to 1.7 million barrels, according to Impact.

While the overall numbers look bad for the industry, brewers and analysts believe some of 1991's problems resulted from a flurry of pre-1991 purchases to avoid the excise tax increase.

After the two publications' numbers were compiled, A-B said its volume declined 0.5% but claimed its share of the industry increased 0.7%. Coors said its shipments actually increased 1.2%, while Miller said its volume increased 0.4%. □

Domino's backs new pizza with $10M

By John P. Cortez

Domino's Pizza will spend $7 million to $10 million to launch its improved pizza, starting with TV spots breaking this weekend on college basketball coverage.

The new pizza, with 45% more cheese, bigger toppings and a thicker crust, should be available nationwide by Feb. 10, said Mike Jenkins, director-public relations at Domino's.

Two 30-second and four 15-second spots continue the "Nobody knows like Domino's" theme, while incorporating the new-product buzzwords, "More melted cheese, big better toppings, tender tastier crust." Grey Advertising, New York, is the agency.

Celebrities appearing in the new commercials include Indiana University basketball coach Bob Knight and "Late Night With David Letterman" comedian Larry "Bud" Mellman.

The company also plans to introduce a deep-dish pizza later this year.

Domino's, the leader in the estimated $6 billion pizza delivery segment with 5,700 stores, has seen its share fall 10 percentage points from 1989 to 46% last year. Industry leader Pizza Hut has been the primary beneficiary; in the past five years, the PepsiCo unit has begun delivery and now has nearly 20% of the segment.

Domino's Chairman Thomas S. Monaghan in December removed David Black as president and reassumed control of Domino's himself, a position he gave up in 1989 while seeking a buyer for the company.

Plans to raise Domino's pizza prices 3% to 7% will likely be offset by discount deals, said Rajan Chaudhry, senior editor of Restaurants & Institutions.

"This segment is highly deal-oriented—40% of the products are sold at a discount rate," he said. "I have no doubt that even premium pizza [from Domino's] will be discounted at some point." □

Domino's new pizza boasting more and better ingredients hits the front lines of the pizza wars Feb. 10.

TV faces transition

Schultz tells NATPE to consider targeted tools

By Alison Fahey

NEW ORLEANS—The marketing and media business—and TV advertising in particular—will never be the same again.

That's the theory of Don Schultz, professor in the integrated advertising/marketing communication department at Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism, who spoke at the National Association of Television Program Executives convention late last month.

In a presentation called "Is TV Advertising Obsolete?" Mr. Schultz said that though the recession is spurring some changes in the ad industry, technological advancements such as product scanners and databases will have a more profound long-term effect, as will the shift in power from manufacturers to retailers.

"Advertising people like to say this is a cycle, that when the economy recovers things will go back to the way they were," Mr. Schultz said. "But our media system will never be the same as before. Mass marketing is dead, but we refuse to bury it."

Replacing mass marketing, "where one message fits all," are "discrete messages targeted according to customer profiles," he said.

"Mass marketing is dead, but we refuse to bury it."

Although Mr. Schultz said TV advertising won't become obsolete, he believes some notions about it are outdated.

"TV advertising does work, but we've been measuring the wrong things," he told the audience, mostly TV station executives.

"Stop counting bodies [and] know more about your viewers," he urged. "Marketers have more information than the media, so they are able to negotiate [price]," he said. "They know what they want to buy, and you don't know what you have."

Mr. Schultz suggested TV stations create their own databases so they have more information on their viewers.

He also advised TV stations to create alliances with direct marketing or sales promotion agencies to offer advertisers more than a "stand-alone media buy."

"We've entered a totally new marketplace, one that requires totally new forms of advertising and marketing," Mr. Schultz said.

The marketing and media industries must recognize a new "media paradigm" where eventually the consumer will control the flow of communication, he said.

"It won't be when marketers want to send out the message," he said. "It'll be when the consumer wants to access it." □

Salem turns up heat

Ideas being tested from Leber Katz, Trone

By Judann Dagnoli and Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—FCB/Leber Katz Partners is competing with a tiny North Carolina agency for a new national ad campaign for R.J. Reynolds' Salem brand, a $40 million account now handled by Leber Katz.

The tobacco marketer is considering both efforts and will choose one based on research now being conducted. A decision is due in about a month.

Leber Katz's competition is tiny Trone Advertising, a Greensboro shop with $31 million in billings that previously worked on R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Corp.'s controversial "Joe Camel" campaign for Camel cigarettes.

However, RJR Chairman-CEO James Johnston said regardless of the outcome of the competition, the account won't be moved.

A decision was due Friday, but sources said the company decided to continue testing the campaign ideas. The testing follows at least six months of rumors that Trone has been pitching on Salem with an eye toward winning the account.

But while the two shops were said to sweating out the creative competition, Mr. Johnston maintained "there is no closet review."

Instead, he likened the situation to RJR asking Trone, Young & Rubicam and Leber Katz to contribute ideas on the Winston "Wrap" campaign last June.

"This is the same thing as Winston," he said. "We are harnessing the talent of all our agencies. Does this lend a little competition [incentive] to our agencies? Yes."

Leber Katz and Trone President Lee Trone both declined comment.

Although Mr. Johnston pointed out that the Winston competition didn't lead to an account move, the company hasn't always shown reluctance to shuffle cigarette accounts. Nor is RJR, which buys its media in-house, likely to spurn Trone because of its size.

In October, the company moved its $45 million Camel account to Mezzina/Brown, then a two-man breakaway shop formed by two ex-staffers from Y&R, the previous agency of record.

RJR has been seeking a long-term image campaign for Salem for well over a year, after scrapping Leber Katz's "Refreshest" effort. □ ship of Nabisco Biscuit Co. President Ellen Marram, another sign of the company's commitment to rebuilding the business, company executives say.

Nabisco

Nabisco's cereal business could use a boost. Market share has steadily declined over the last few years, from a 5.2% pound share in 1988 to 3.3% for the year ended Oct. 5, according to Nielsen Marketing Research.

Behind the decline were two failed products. Breakfast Bears cereal, based on Nabisco's highly successful Teddy Grahams cookies, flopped because the cereal didn't hold up well in milk. The other failure was Fruit Wheats, featuring fruit inside a wheat square; it didn't catch on with consumers.

Like others, Nabisco also erred in jumping on the oat bran bandwagon in 1988. The company introduced several oat bran line extensions, including Shredded Wheat With Oat Bran, which faded with the oat bran fad in 1990.

At the same time, Nabisco's ad spending began a precipitous decline.

In 1989, the company spent $22 million to support its cereal lines, plunging to $8 million for the nine months ended in September, LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service reported.

Nabisco wouldn't say how much spending will be increased over the next two years. But given the breadth of its Shredded Wheat effort, the increase is expected to be healthy, taking spending over the $15 million mark at least.

A network TV spot, in 15- and 30-second versions, shows "American Bandstand" host Dick Clark "celebrating a birthday for a living legend," which he says "is not me, although you probably think I've been around forever."

The commercial kicks off a consumer promotion in which Nabisco is putting certificates worth $100 each in 10,000 boxes of Shredded Wheat, Shredded Wheat 'n Bran and Shredded Wheat Spoon Size through April.

T.J. Paul, a Philadelphia promotion house, handles the promotion.

Nabisco also plans "birthday breakfast parties" for Shredded Wheat in Miami, Houston, Denver and Naperville, Ill., in May. The parties will feature the "Shredded Wheat Band."

In June, the company will host a party in Niagara Falls, N.Y., site of the first Nabisco Shredded Wheat factory.

Although Mr. Baumbusch wouldn't discuss creative for the long-term campaign, he indicated it will update the Shredded Wheat brand image while preserving its equity as a trusted tradition. □ at ways to help consumers beat the recession. They should be looking at ways they can use their marketing dollars in ways that directly benefit consumers."

Coupons

Leading the greater-than-expected growth in distribution was the steep rise in the number of health & beauty aids coupons, which NCH determined rose 11.2% to 68.6 billion. The number of grocery-product coupons rose 2.6% to 223.4 billion.

Consumers saved more than $4 billion with coupons; manufacturers paid retailers $596.8 million in fees for coupon handling.

The recession has confounded earlier suggestions that coupon distribution was reaching saturation, said Ken Bortner, president of News America's free standing insert division. He expects distribution to rise again in 1992.

"I think when you have 23 million people on food stamps or some sort of public aid, and when you can deliver, say, savings of $30 through a coupon drop, people are going to take note of that and use those coupons," he said. "And with the onset of brand parity, more people are buying on price."

The average face value of redeemed coupons in 1991 was 54¢, up 8.4% from 49.8¢ in 1990.

FSIs remained the primary choice for coupon delivery, accounting for 79.6% of the total, compared with 79.9% in 1990, according to NCH. Newspapers' share was unchanged at 5.3%, and magazines remained steady at 2.3%.

Direct mail delivery, which gained share through the 1980s, declined a percentage point to a 4% share. In-pack/on-pack coupons gained slightly, accounting for 3.8% vs. 3.5% in 1990.

The biggest gain in NCH's media tracking came in the "other" category, which is primarily in-store couponing such as on-shelf or at-checkout dispensers. The category's share rose to 5% from 3.9%.

Unlike NCH, CMS tracks "in-ad" coupons, distributed primarily through retailer-sponsored co-op circulars. CMS said in-ad coupons accounted for 7% of the 314 billion coupons distributed in 1991, up dramatically from 3% of 280 billion coupons in 1990.

"When we asked consumers whether they expected the economy to get better or worse over the next six months, 30% said they expected it to be worse, 40% said they thought it would be the same," Ms. Perrin said. "Given that pessimism, it's likely coupon use will continue to rise." □

U.S. Department of Justice.

FDA investigative tactics prompted the formation of the Coalition of Healthcare Communicators, which includes the American Association of Advertising Agencies, Pharmaceutical Advertising Council and other health, media and pharmaceutical companies. The group will develop a strategy on how to deal with the FDA. The issue is also among the topics of a series of legal affairs seminars this month sponsored by the Four A's.

In response to charges of strong-arm tactics, FDA spokesman Mike Shaffer said: "I don't think anyone here would acknowledge that, and I don't know if it's accurate. But my understanding is that the agency has the right to inspect records, and I would presume that companies cannot transfer records to employees' homes to avoid [FDA inspection] . . . and that may have been what has happened."

Increasing pressure from the pharmaceutical industry appears to have contributed to the FDA's change of heart about issuing guidelines.

"We were surprised at the reaction to the guidelines we proposed for continuing medical education," said Mr. Shaffer, referring to the agency's initial proposals explaining what the FDA would and wouldn't allow in drug company-sponsored conferences.

After the proposed medical conference guidelines were issued, the Coalition of Healthcare Communicators issued a stinging critique.

"We had thought that we would issue [the guidelines] and that everyone would knuckle under."

"We had thought that we would issue [the guidelines] and that everyone would knuckle under," Mr. Shaffer said. "Now the agency's thinking is more to doing something cooperatively. And because of the trouble with the CME guidelines, there may be grounds for saying there will be problems in other areas as well," such as proposed guidelines for direct-to-consumer advertising.

The major criticisms of the FDA's proposed guidelines for continuing medical education centered on whether the agency might be trying to assert its regulatory role in an area of speech protected by the First Amendment and whether the agency was squelching information that would be beneficial to the public, said John Kamp, Four A's VP.

"The FDA was saying that if research was funded by a drug company, and that the results of that research with respect to a particular disease were discussed at a conference, then the discussion could only be about the approved use of that drug," Mr. Kamp said.

FDA Commissioner David Kessler has publicly expressed concern about the objectivity of medical conferences sponsored by pharmaceutical companies, saying some appear to be little more than a promotion for the companies' drugs.

Mr. Shaffer said the FDA's likely next step could be to rely on an accredited third party to monitor medical conferences for compliance with FDA policies.

"They would not have enforcement authority but could report any violations to the FDA," he said.

"As for consumer media advertising, we will have to issue something—guidelines or a policy statement," he said but offered no time frame. □

Creative is likely to incorporate the animated spokescharacters on Fun Feast's packaging. Each box features a different animal such as Edgar the Elephant, Melvin the Moose and Sammy the Shark.

Boxes also contain "surprise packs" of trinkets like personalized memo pads, doorknob hangers or a "secret decoder."

To outflank ConAgra, which holds 66.4% of the $122 million frozen kids meal segment, according to Nielsen Marketing Research figures, and Tyson, with 33.6%, Campbell is pricing the Swanson line lower than competitors.

Mr. Van Stone said the suggested retail price on Fun Feast is $1.89, compared with Looney Tunes, now at $2.19 after a price drop in May from $2.39. Kid Cuisine is priced at about $1.99.

Despite the strength of the established players, there may be room for a third competitor in frozen kids meals.

Nielsen figures for the year ended Sept. 14 show Kid Cuisine sales at $81 million, up 29.4% from a year earlier, even before ConAgra added new breakfast and six Mega Meal varieties last fall. Looney Tunes doubled its sales to $41 million by adding new varieties, including Looney Tunes Pasta.

Still, some food industry executives remain wary of the long-term future of kid-specific meals, remembering all too well the failure of the former Libby, McNeil & Libby's Libbyland kids meals in 1972.

Mary Anne Jackson, founder of My Own Meal Co., a marketer of shelf-stable kids' meals, said the category is "absolutely here to stay."

"Parents are looking for good, fast-food for their kids, and Kid Cuisine has done a good job of coming out with new products, like Mega Meals," she said. "But there will be more room for new players if they don't duplicate products. Kids like variety as much as retailers do." □

The study found that among households with cable TV, viewers were more aware of Cable News Network than Fox Broadcasting Co.

Turner Broadcasting System's CNN ranked fourth in unaided awareness among all TV networks behind the Big 3 TV networks, while Fox placed fifth.

Even in households without cable TV, CNN gained significant awareness, with 10% of the respondents citing the cable TV network, compared with 3% the previous year.

Mr. Guggenheim said CNN's awareness was heightened by its coverage of the Persian Gulf War, among other things, and by the media coverage the network received.

"Once you put that type of awareness in people's minds . . . my guess is that it won't decline," he said. □

Michelob thinks older

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch is backing its eroding superpremium Michelob brand with a new strategy and campaign that aims for an older audience instead of its traditional 21-to-26-year-old target.

Michelob ads are also targeting women more strongly.

"What we have been watching is a shift. The population is aging a bit," said Bob Goughenour, group brand director for Michelob. "The Michelob family has greater appeal to that audience—adults. That generation knows Michelob's quality, and it's a reasonably good target with a whole lot of value, not to mention the competitive pressure in the battle for younger drinkers."

The new campaign, from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, broke Jan. 26 and takes a "Michelob family" orientation—replacing most individual advertising for Michelob, Michelob Light and Michelob Dry.

Network TV, radio and print ads use a "Some days are better than others" theme. TV and print ads feature people celebrating an event.

Company officials wouldn't disclose spending, but industry sources estimate A-B will spend at most $25 million on the brands this year. Michelob advertising is expected to air during the Winter Olympics.

The campaign is the first since D'Arcy regained the mainline Michelob account in August from DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, and is the first major image-oriented TV effort since the "Night belongs to Michelob" campaign three years ago.

Questions remain, however, about long-term plans for Michelob. A-B is also expanding its test of premium-price Michelob Golden Draft and Golden Draft Light, two Miller Genuine Draft look-alikes, with ads from DDB Needham.

Michelob is suffering from a continuing sales slide. Last year, Michelob, the nation's No. 14 brand, saw shipments slip 12.9% to 2.7 million barrels and its market share slip to 1.4%, Impact reported. □

"Direct mail can be informative, but I get more useful information from my trade magazines."

Your customers and prospects do get helpful information from the direct mail they receive. But, the fact is, the buying influences you need to reach depend more on their trade publications for information that helps them make buying decisions. A recent study, conducted by the Forsyth Group, confirms it.

The study asked 9,823 business and professional buying influences what sources of information they found most useful in shopping for the products and services they buy for their companies. Almost invariably, they ranked specialized business publications first.

Other sources of information were also well regarded by many respondents. The results suggest that sales representatives, trade shows and direct mail are valuable parts of a solid marketing mix. But to reach the most prospects for the least money, you can't top trade magazines.

GM turns to Japan

$8M campaign stresses quality of Cadillacs

By David Kilburn

TOKYO—General Motors Corp. hopes to polish its image in Japan by launching its most extensive TV advertising campaign ever. The U.S.-based car company plans to break an $8 million campaign here in March for the Cadillac Seville that will illustrate how well its cars can compete with Japanese models.

"Our strategy is to remove the misunderstandings about American cars," said Ichiro Sugita, GM advertising and sales promotion manager here. "We are going to communicate the quality of GM cars to the Japanese people, especially the Cadillac Seville, which is our flagship."

The GM campaign is designed to persuade skeptical Japanese consumers that the Seville, launched in November, is fully competitive in terms of fuel efficiency, fit and finish with Japanese and German luxury marques. McCann-Erickson Hakuhodo handles.

GM's Mr. Sugita said spot TV and print ads are planned, along with sports sponsorships.

Spending will depend on how many cars are sold, but the company will spend no less than $8 million, he said. The campaign will run for a year.

Total Cadillac sales in Japan were 1,000 last year, mainly Eldorado and Fleetwood models.

"This year, we have no specific [sales] target," Mr. Sugita said. "We want to sell as many as possible, and we're hoping for a 20% to 30% increase."

Mr. Sugita views upscale Japanese cars, such as Toyota Motor Corp.'s Crown and Nissan Motor Co.'s Cima, as Cadillac's main competitors.

"We are also competing with Mercedes and BMW, but our first competition is the Japanese domestic car," Mr. Sugita said. "The European cars are our secondary target."

Cadillac Seville, however, sells for about $60,000 while Toyota's Crown line is priced as low as $11,000 for some models, and as high as $50,000. Nissan's Cima line ranges from $35,000 to $50,000.

In January, 18,000 Crowns were sold, making it Toyota's best-selling line. About 4,500 Nissan Cimas are sold monthly.

"We wish GM every success with their marketing plans," said a Toyota spokesman in Tokyo.

Last year, GM sold a postwar record 10,301 cars in Japan, up about 11% from 1990. That was 5% of the imported auto market. GM also sells its Buick, Pontiac and Chevrolet lines in Japan.

German brands Mercedes-Benz, Volkswagen, BMW and Audi lead the import sector, together holding about 64% of the import market. □

AmEx's Olympics ambush may goad IOC into action

By Gary Levin

American Express Co. last week defended its ambush marketing attack on Visa International's Olympic sponsorship, but the practice is likely to lead the International Olympic Committee to review the way it sells marketing rights.

AmEx's ambush TV campaign is a response to Visa spots themed "The Olympics don't take American Express." The AmEx commercials urge viewers "going to the winter fun and games" in Albertville, France, not to believe that AmEx is excluded by area merchants, as some "bank cards" might suggest.

"They've technically not violated anything, but in our minds they've tried to create an impression," said Jan Soderstrom, senior VP-advertising and promotion at Visa USA. "What they're trying to do is clear-cut ambush marketing."

The new TV spots from Chiat/Day/Mojo, New York, don't explicitly mention the Olympics or use its symbols or logos.

AmEx said it was only reacting with "clarification advertising" to what it calls Visa's "misleading" suggestions in spots from BBDO Worldwide that imply AmEx cards aren't accepted anywhere in Albertville.

AmEx cards aren't accepted for Olympic ticket sales or by on-site merchants but are accepted by other area establishments.

"If Visa decided to file a lawsuit, we would welcome it," said Elisabeth Coleman, an AmEx spokeswoman. "We feel a public airing of the AmEx-bashing Visa ads is long overdue. We're just setting the record straight."

The IOC, which governs official sponsorships, hasn't responded to the latest AmEx salvo, said Michael Payne, its director of marketing.

But the Court of the First Instance in Paris last week fined AmEx $26,000 for unauthorized use of Olympic rings in Expressions, a magazine circulated to 400,000 AmEx cardmembers in Europe. The suit was filed by French Olympic organizing committees.

Still, Mr. Payne said in an earlier interview that the IOC will try to prevent ambush marketing attempts by publicizing flagrant violations. The IOC will also re-evaluate the way it sells sponsorships for the 1996 Summer Olympics, he said.

Talks center on perhaps seeking to double the price tag for worldwide The Olympic Program II sponsorships, now estimated at $20 million. In exchange, sponsors would get rights in their category to sponsor all U.S. teams, federations and pre-Olympic events, which Coca-Cola Co. has secured this year through its own negotiations.

Currently, negotiations to sponsor individual U.S. teams, for example, are handled separately. AmEx will sponsor the cycling and swimming teams this year at the Summer Olympics in Barcelona.

But some TOP II sponsors may balk at paying higher prices, since total sponsorship still doesn't prevent a competitor from advertising during the Games or using athletes or other sports motifs. □

Chrysler ads fight foreign brands

By Raymond Serafin

It's not "Japan bashing," but a new corporate Chrysler spot slated to break on the Winter Olympics last weekend is geared to improving its image against foreign brands.

In the spot, Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca acknowledges foreign competitors have been giving U.S. carmakers a beating. But he goes on to say Chrysler has restructured its way of developing product, built a $1 billion technology center and is bringing new products to market.

"In the car business, you lead, follow or get out of the way . . . and Chrysler intends to be a leader," Mr. Iacocca says in the 60-second spot.

He appears with three key new products the company is rolling out this year—the Dodge Viper sports car, Jeep Grand Cherokee sport utility vehicle and Dodge Intrepid, one of three new midsize sedans.

Bozell, New York, created the corporate campaign, part of a planned 18-month effort to establish Chrysler as an automotive leader.

"There are a lot of loyal import owners who believe the domestic Big 3 aren't capable of producing cars that have the quality and technical excellence of the Japanese," said John Damoose, Chrysler's VP-marketing. "We have to close that perception gap. With the changes we've made, we can compete with anyone in the world."

The Chrysler approach is similar in theme to several recent efforts by General Motors Corp. and its divisions. In essence, the advertising frankly acknowledges that many consumers don't have a high opinion of U.S.-nameplate vehicles, then goes on to claim the product being advertised is now a worthy competitor for the best products in the world.

A prime example of the genre is the introductory advertising for the redesigned 1992 Cadillac Seville and Eldorado models, which won critical praise from automotive journalists. □

Ninety of the 200 measured brands see their ad spending slip for the nine-month period; Kellogg nearly catches McDonald's

THE TOP 200 BRANDS

Third quarter humbles leaders

By R. Craig Endicott

The Top 200 Brands are no longer a safe haven for the nation's media.

Recession-year spending cuts by most of the players in this elite group produced an 8.5% decline in the third quarter of 1991. The three-quarter total was $10.74 billion, down 0.4% from 1990.

This dip came on the heels of a 3.6% gain in the first half of 1991, when all media spending slipped 7.8% below prior-year levels.

The nation's top advertised brand name, McDonald's restaurants, cut third-quarter spending 25.2% below levels for the previous year, to close with a $286.8 million three-quarter total. It narrowly escaped being passed by No. 2 Kellogg breakfast foods.

Kellogg Co. invested $281.3 million in the same period, including $103.6 million in the third quarter—the top volume for any brand in that period. Yet Kellogg's overall spending fell 9.2% from the year-earlier period, compared with a 15% decline for McDonald's.

Advertising Age calculates the Top 200 Brands from nine-media totals provided by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. Rankings, done quarterly, are based on year-to-date figures.

Spending cuts were rife throughout the Top 200. Ninety of the 200—from McDonald's to No. 200 Vidal Sassoon haircare products, at $21.4 million—spent less during the three quarters in 1991 than in 1990.

Among the four top media, only magazines showed a gain, up 2.8%. But spending in syndicated TV and on cable networks emerged as bright spots, with syndication growing 21.5% for three quarters among the Top 200 while cable networks gained by 18.5%.

About 54% of syndicated dollars and 40% of network cable's come from the Top 200.

Despite the humbling quarter, the Top 200 Brands still outshone all media advertising, which dropped 8.3%, to $27.2 billion, for the three periods.

A third-quarter ad erosion was never more apparent than in spending by domestic and import automakers.

Media suffered through a 15.9% decline in automobile ad spending from the 31 brands among the Top 200 in the third quarter. The quarter turned a 2.7% gain at the half-way mark in 1991 into a 3.6% decline for the nine months.

Domestic cars accounted for $1.2 billion of the category, up 0.9% from the prior year; Asian brands claimed a $910.4 million total, down 7.3%. The automobile category, with $2.4 billion in spending, contributed 26% of the Top 200's ad total for the three quarters.

Total expenditures also declined for food, retail and restaurant categories. Only entertainment, toiletries and beer among the top 10 categories boosted spending—up 6.4%, 8.8% and 20.6%, respectively.

Network TV advertising in the third quarter dropped a precipitous 12.6% for the Top 200, producing a 5.5% spending decline for the three quarters. First-half spending had been down 2.4%. Total network TV advertising declined 7.1% for the nine months.

The medium, accounting for 62% of all Top 200 spending, was paced by Kellogg with $183.9 million, down 23.4% from the prior-year. Only entertainment among the top 10 categories increased network spending, up 14.8%.

The leading brands proved far more generous toward spot TV through the first half than in the third quarter, when they trimmed spot buys by 8.8%. That drought turned a 2.9% gain by mid-1991 to a 1.4% decline for the longer period—still far better than the 7.9% decline for all advertising in the medium in the same period.

Although much has been made of the poor showing by consumer magazines in '91, they nevertheless remained relatively attractive to the Top 200 advertisers. Magazines gained 2.8% for the nine months despite a 3.2% decline in third-quarter spending from the prior year.

All magazine advertising declined 2.2% in the third quarter for a 4.8% drop in year-to-date.

Newspaper advertising remained in the doghouse, declining 6% for the Top 200, which spent 12.9% less in third-quarter 1991 than the same period in 1990. Although accounting for only 22% of all newspaper advertising, the Top 200 is critical to the medium because all newspaper advertising dropped 21.3% for the nine months.

Philip Morris Cos., while leading all advertisers in media expenditures for the three quarters at $923.7 million, was down 4.4%. Still, it maintained a substantial lead over Procter & Gamble Co. at $810.5 million, down 7.8%.

General Motors Corp. was third at $698.5 million, up 0.5%. However, GM supported its eight brands in the Top 200 with $670.2 million—the largest parent total among the Top 200. □

LETTERS

Faith restored

I was beginning to believe that reason no longer pertained in the dialogue about political advertising and that shrillness was to be the deciding factor.

Then I read your lead editorial ("Quit the mudslinging," AA, Jan. 27) and my faith was restored. Thank you.

John O'Toole
President, American Association of Advertising Agencies
New York

Loose cannons

Alex Kroll has it right when he "castigates" political advertising. Much of it is terrible. And if we needed more convincing, all we had to do was read some of the responses from political consultants (AA, Jan. 20). Such wholesome rhetoric as "This letter will be a shot across the bow . . . if they want war we'll give it to them." Or "some of the obscene stuff they do," with threats of launching a "broadside." Yep, that's about the level of discourse we'd expect.

Political advertising and such eager-to-fight swashbucklers are loose cannons on the ship of state —harmful to advertising and, worse, to the country, its citizens and voters.

Regulate cigarette ads

We commend Advertising Age for its editorial, "Old Joe must go" (AA, Jan. 13), which clearly communicated its conviction that "sprightly cartoon ads like the ones featuring Old Joe" for R.J. Reynolds' Camel cigarettes "encourage youngsters to smoke." RJR has repeatedly denied that charge. You had the courage to tell them they are wrong and should drop the campaign. . . .

The Joe Camel campaign is probably in a class by itself in the annals of poor taste in advertising, but it is only the most extreme example of the inherent dangers of allowing a known hazardous consumer product to be advertised without federal regulations or oversight. . . .

Our federal government must step in now and regulate the advertising, sale, distribution and manufacture of cigarettes in the way it currently does for prescription drugs, foods and even innocuous consumer products like toothpaste and lipstick. Tobacco advertising in particular should not be given such extraordinary First Amendment protection when other legal commercial products are not.

Julia believes in love

Your report on magazine covers (AA, Jan. 20) was not accurate. The coverline "Julia in love," on Ladies' Home Journal's July cover, which also features a picture of Ms. Roberts, was not a caption but was, in fact, part of a direct quote of hers. "I believe in love," she said, which I'm sure remains Ms. Roberts' sentiment even after the breakup of her engagement.

By the way, it was an issue that sold well on the newsstand.

Toe much to drink?

This is most definitely not an ad we can do without. We could do with a lot more of these.

Where else do we find a ravishing bride, apparently half blind from drinking too much B&B brandy . . . who also happens to have six toes (inset)?

Is this a great drink or what?

Size doesn't count

Your story relating to the Alcone Sims O'Brien merger (AA, Dec. 23) just may vie for the "hot air" award of 1991 concerning sales promotion agencies.

During our 21 years in business, having clients among the top 400 marketers as well as smaller regional companies, never has the size of our staff, the amount of our billings or how large is our office space been a factor in winning and keeping clients.

We love to hear our competitors brag about their "size," especially when our own success has been in attaining new clients, and keeping them, from the so-called "big" sales promotion agencies.

Tom Watson, president of Omnicom's Diversified Agency Services, the controlling parent of the merger, is quoted in Ad Age that "we would have to be at least talked to by major national marketers." With reference to his assumption that the size of the merged shop will have the phones ring off their hooks—that is a fantasy.

Clinton review missed point

Bob Garfield may have missed one point about Bill Clinton's direct response ad in the Political Ad Review (AA, Jan. 13).

The mere fact that Gov. Clinton is offering his "Plan for America's Future" to voters via an 800 number puts him way ahead of most political advertisers. And he's apt to be pleased with the technique of direct response, since 1,300 New Hampshire residents phoned for the Clinton plan on the first two days the commercial was on the air.

When was the last time we saw an 800 number in a political ad that was for anything other than raising funds for the candidate's campaign?

Poll conclusions wrong

I wish to comment on the unwarranted conclusions in your story "Poll: Ads strain credibility" (AA, Dec. 16).

You reported that, "In a third-quarter telephone survey by Video Storyboard Tests, seven out of 10 respondents said they believe few, if any, of the ads they see on TV or in print." According to the accompanying chart, they said no such thing. A large majority of 72% responded that "only some ads are believable." As this is incontrovertibly true (unless all ads are untrue), it is not surprising to me that most respondents agreed with the statement.

These two conclusions are supported: 1) Only some ads are true, and 2) consumers know this. These two conclusions do seem to merit greater attention by persons in advertising.

Cindy equals advertising

Let's hope Bob Garfield is being ironic when, in his review of the New Look of Pepsi commercial (AA, Jan. 13), he writes, "Not incidentally, every time you see this new logo you will conjure up Cindy Crawford. And that, I believe, is advertising."

Funny, but I thought Pepsi was in the business of selling soft drinks, not supermodels. The selection of Mrs. Richard Gere to introduce the new Pepsi graphics represents an ideal marriage of celebrity and product. Cindy Crawford represents an all-American standard of desirable beauty—exactly the image Pepsi wants to create for its new package.

Not incidentally, every time you see Cindy Crawford on the cover and in the pages of countless magazines, you will conjure Pepsi. And that, I believe, is advertising.

The Cindy Crawford commercial on behalf of the new Pepsi logo didn't send me into the swooning mood Mr. Garfield seemed to experience. In fact, the commercial seemed such a blatant attempt to sell products via sex that it made me think that Mr. Garfield very well may need a break from viewing commercials. Or maybe he just needs a date.

Unlike Mr. Garfield, every time I see the new Pepsi logo I don't think of Ms. Crawford or her supposed goddesslike qualities. Instead, I think, "What an ugly logo."

'Addicted' to research, Nick shows strong kids' lure

Agency exec says net hits the hot button

By Joseph M. Winski

Geraldine Laybourne cherishes the moment.

She was at a newsstand in the Newark, N.J., airport. A boy examining a kids' magazine asked his mother if she thought the magazine would be funny enough.

"If Nickelodeon did a magazine, would it be funny enough?" Ms. Laybourne asked the boy. "You bet," he responded.

Ms. Laybourne is president of Nickelodeon, the cable TV network for kids—and of Nick at Nite, its nighttime partner.

For her, the incident confirmed once more what a growing number of media and marketing folks also have come to believe: When it comes to kids, few organizations know them better than the Viacom-owned Nick.

In a survey conducted last year for the network by Yankelovich Clancy Shulman, a national sample of Nickelodeon viewers was asked if the network understood kids; 93% said yes.

"I like to say the other 7% just didn't understand the question," Ms. Laybourne says, exhibiting a touch of the sass and wit that characterize her network from programs to promos.

Advertisers agree.

Ad revenues of Nickelodeon/Nick at Nite jumped 34% to $78.5 million last year, according to TV industry consultant Paul Kagan & Associates. The cable network's total revenues rose 21% to $167.5 million.

"Nickelodeon certainly makes it their business to know kids and get inside their heads," says Mark Mears, Pizza Hut's director of kids/entertainment marketing.

Pizza Hut is so taken with the network's ability to connect with its audience it has "adopted the Nickelodeon attitude, if you will, in our efforts to reach kids," says Mr. Mears.

Pizza Hut has advertised on the network for three years, and last month staged a successful promotion of its kids' pizza-pack (complete with Slime pudding) tied to the new animated shows, Mr. Mears says.

"I think they're doing all the right things," says Jack Irving, exec VP-director of media operations for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. He's especially impressed with Nickelodeon's ability to "develop tremendous promotions [for advertisers] that really talk the kids' language, that really hit some hot buttons."

To accomplish that end, Nickelodeon has made research a top priority. It does considerable quantitative research, such as Yankelovich's annual Youth Monitor, and smaller tracking studies. But its primary research vehicle is the focus group.

Last year, Nickelodeon says, it conducted 200 to 250 focus groups with kids, which may be the most of any organization targeting the kids' market.

Many are held in facilities built expressly for focus groups at the network's huge studios at Universal Studios Florida in Orlando, where kids are pulled from tour groups and given a Nick T-shirt for their thoughts.

Ms. Laybourne, who calls research "addictive," attends focus groups, as do others involved in Nickelodeon programming. Focus groups near the New York headquarters frequently have more people watching from behind the one-way mirror than the six to 10 kids who normally participate, Nickelodeon staffers say.

It was early research that shaped the very essence of Nickelodeon: a saucy, flip and hip spirit as unique in its way as that of its sister network, MTV: Music Television.

"We went out to the kids and we asked what we thought were the most innocuous questions, like what do you like about being a kid," Ms. Laybourne recalls. "And we got some pretty amazing and sometimes alarming answers."

"The Ren and Stimpy Show" made Nickelodeon's schedule on the strength of its pilot with kids.

Contrary to conventional wisdom, which holds that pre-teens can't wait to grow up, "We kept hearing from kids that they didn't want to be teen-agers," says Marshall Cohen, exec VP of research and planning for MTV Networks, which oversees Viacom's cable networks.

"We asked why, and they started talking about all these horrible things about teen-age life: drugs, AIDS, sex problems. They were worried about nuclear war, the environment, homeless people, their parents, and somewhere on that list they were worried about getting good grades."

So although Nickelodeon's programming for preschool kids, called Nick Jr., is similar to conventional kids' shows (except for "Nick Jr. Rocks," kids' music videos launched last fall), the network felt it needed a distinctive voice to reach school-age kids.

Rather than teach, preach and inspire, it decided it would provide escape and refuge: "Enjoyable, fun, a good, safe place on the TV dial for kids who are growing up in this kind of world—with a sort of us-vs.-them attitude," is how Mr. Cohen describes it.

Thus, on Nickelodeon game shows, kids get doused with green slime. On "Clarissa Tells It All," Clarissa relates the horrors of little brothers. On "You Can't Do That on Television," kids take verbal potshots at decidedly uncool parents.

This is all the result of a process unlike conventional program development: Producer comes in with idea; network OKs pilot; pilot is aired and tested; network accepts or rejects show.

Nickelodeon typically begins with focus groups in which it discusses rudimentary concepts for shows or even just brainstorms with kids.

There is an art to this, for the whole idea at Nickelodeon isn't to copy what's already on but to come up with new types of programs.

Nickelodeon has become the country's largest producer of original children's programming.

"You can't just ask, 'What's missing on your screen?' because they'll say nothing," says Geoffrey Darby, Nickelodeon senior VP-programming and production.

Rather, he says, "you go in and probe," and ask the targeted audience how they spend their time, what their favorite movies are, what videogames they're playing and the like. "From that we can get some hints" on directions worth pursuing, he says.

Then—once it decides on a type of show—Nickelodeon hires a producer to make a pilot and takes it back to focus groups again and again to get it right.

One focus-group finding, that kids like to be scared, sent the network off in search of a scary show that doesn't rely on blood and gore. The result, a live-action pilot called "Are You Afraid of the Dark?" soon will be shown to focus groups for their opinion, Mr. Darby says.

Sometimes Nickelodeon uses the same kids, called "expert groups," throughout the development process for a given show. That's what it did with "Double Dare," the game show that became such a hit the network syndicated it for what Ms. Laybourne has called "windfall profits."

Kids viewing the first "Double Dare" pilot said the show was "too predictable," because the phys-

Netting the numbers

While the Big 3 networks bemoan their loss of young viewers—NBC going so far as to bail out of kids' Saturday morning programming, effective next August—Nickelodeon's audience has been building.

As recently as four years ago, the major networks still commanded a substantially larger audience for kids' shows than Nickelodeon. Today, Nickelodeon claims more viewers of kids' programming than the three networks combined.

Among kids 2 to 11 years old, Nick's share has grown to 29%, or more than double the combined three networks' share, now just 14.6%, according to a Nickelodeon analysis of Nielsen Market Research figures.

Nick's share now approaches the 31.5% held by syndicated children's programming; four years ago, syndicated shows had a 48.7% share, three times Nickelodeon's.

Nickelodeon's knack with kids has been a long time in the making. When it began in 1979, it was a sober, commercial-free channel—some called it the "Eat-Your-Vegetables" station—usually thrown into the pot by cable systems bidding for city franchises.

It gradually built a reputation for innovative shows. But its revenues, limited to fees paid by cable systems, were insufficient for truly ambitious programming.

Success has spawned spinoff ventures, including a Nickelodeon toy line being introduced this month by Mattel at the American International Toy Fair in New York. A few years back, Green Slime Shampoo, based on the glop featured in a Nick game show, was a hot seller.

Nickelodeon President Geraldine Laybourne, a former schoolteacher, signed on as program manager in 1980. In 1984, large in debt and small in audience, Nickelodeon made Ms. Laybourne president and began carrying advertising.

"The first thing I did was say, 'Hey, we've got to involve kids in this process," she says. "We have to hear from them what's going on." □

Nick 'addicted' to research

ical challenge always came last, Mr. Darby recalls. So the producers changed "Double Dare" to allow the grease-and-goo antics to occur any time. "It worked phenomenally well," he says.

Nickelodeon, which also tries to avoid sexual stereotyping, wanted "Clarissa Tells It All" to appeal to both boys and girls. Focus groups stressed that sibling rivalry is a big thing with kids. So Clarissa's scheming against her odious sib Ferguson, whom she calls "Ferg-face," is a recurring plot element.

Nickelodeon's faith in research—as well as its boldness and growing financial might—is amply demonstrated by the 90-minute Sunday block of animated shows it launched last August.

The easy, cheaper way would have been to borrow existing characters, as ABC did with rap singer Hammer and CBS with Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles.

But Nickelodeon wanted to create truly new characters, so despite the high cost of animation—Ms. Laybourne says the network spent $40 million to develop the cartoons—it produced eight fully animated pilots.

Three of them—"Rugrats," "Doug" and "The Ren and Stimpy Show"—passed muster with the kids.

The shows as a group had the highest-rated debut of any program in Nickelodeon history. □

News just for adults? Not according to Nick

This spring, Nickelodeon will unveil a news program for kids. Here are highlights of how the show came to be:

August 1989: Initially cold to news programming, saying that's "for adults," kids in a focus group OK news if done by Nickelodeon, because Nick would make it "cool and fun."

April 1990: Nickelodeon takes experts and producers to fourth-through-sixth-graders for a discussion of what a kids' news show should be.

November 1990: A 30-minute pilot is tested with four focus groups in two cities. Overall results are positive, but kids found the pacing too slow.

January 1991: War breaks out in the Middle East. Nickelodeon hires Linda Ellerbee's production company, Lucky Duck Productions, to do a special. Producers go into classrooms to ask kids what they want to know about the war.

February 1991: The 30-minute special airs. In April focus groups, kids say it told them what they wanted to know. The network hires Lucky Duck to produce a weekly half-hour news show, and in June commissions more specials. □

Beleaguered 'Bazaar'

New hires aim to turn around fashion title

By Scott Donaton

Hearst Magazines' hiring of consultant Joseph Armstrong is yet another sign that Hearst is trying to whip Harper's Bazaar into shape.

Mr. Armstrong, former publisher of Rolling Stone and New York Magazine, was hired early this month to help restore the luster of the 125-year-old fashion magazine (AA, Feb. 3).

D. Claeys Bahrenburg, president of Hearst Magazines, downplayed the significance of the move, saying the company regularly hires consultants.

But the hiring of Mr. Armstrong, 47, comes just weeks after Hearst appointed Elizabeth Tilberis, 44, editor in chief of Bazaar. That sets the stage for an editorial battle between Ms. Tilberis, former editor of British Vogue, and Anna Wintour, editor in chief of Vogue and Ms. Tilberis' predecessor at British Vogue.

The changes made under Ms. Tilberis are expected to be so extensive "we're calling it a relaunch," said Bazaar Publisher Carl Portale. "This is a fairly large investment on the part of Hearst."

Changes will include a redesign and "another kind of [editorial] concept," he said. Bazaar also will increase its focus on culture, the arts and travel in addition to fashion. The June issue will be the first under Ms. Tilberis' direction.

Hearst executives are calling the anticipated changes a relauch.

Bazaar has been battered by the recession and growing competition. The 1985 launch of Elle and its subsequent head-to-head battle with Conde Nast Publications' category-leading Vogue squeezed Bazaar into third place in the field. Upstart Mirabella has intensified the competition.

"Traditionally, you had a two-magazine market, with Vogue and Harper's Bazaar dominating the fashion business," said Daniel McNamee, president of McNamee Consulting. "In recent years, Bazaar definitely got left behind. Now, it's at least a four-way duel."

Bazaar carried 1,051 ad pages last year, a 26.3% decline from the previous year. Ad pages fell 14.8% to 2,526 at Vogue; 23.3% to 1,762 at Elle; and 15.6% to 918.9 at Mirabella.

Bazaar also ranks third in circulation in the fashion field with a rate base of 700,000, behind Vogue's 1.1 million and Elle's 825,000 but ahead of Mirabella's 575,000.

Mr. McNamee believes the fashion field can't support four magazines, but said Bazaar might be one of the survivors.

"Hearst has got a lot of resources," he said. "If they go muscle their way in there, sure, they can take it back."

Mr. Armstrong was publisher of Rolling Stone in the mid-1970s, and later served as president, publisher and editor of New York Magazine and New West. In 1982, he launched the short-lived monthly The Movies, a forerunner to Premiere. Since then, he's worked as a media and marketing consultant for clients including Gannett Co.'s USA Today, Time Warner and Random House.

After Bazaar, Mr. Armstrong is expected to focus on Town & Country, also struggling. Like Bazaar, it has a new editor in chief, former Philadelphia Editor Ron Javers, 45. He succeeded Frank Zachary, who replaced Anthony Mazzola as editor in chief in 1972, when the latter moved to Bazaar.

Town & Country's ad pages declined 27.8% to 1,160 last year. □

Adults eye kids shows

NEW YORK—While ratings for children watching kids TV programming have fallen off dramatically in the past year, a surprisingly high number of adults appears to be watching kids shows.

Nielsen Media Research's special analysis of ratings last September found about one-quarter of all viewing of children's TV programming was done by households without kids.

ABC was the broadcast network with the greatest percentage of adult viewers in its kids programming audience, 26.1%. Fox Broadcasting Co. had the lowest percentage of any broadcast source (21.4% Saturday mornings, 17.6% weekdays).

Kids' viewing of Saturday morning children's programming fell 8% during Sept. 16 to Dec. 23 from the same period in 1990, according to an analysis of Nielsen data by N W Ayer, New York. Ayer attributed the decline to an increase in non-children's programming, which also gives adult viewers more Saturday morning options.

The falloff in Saturday morning kids ratings also might be due to more kids programming throughout the week on outlets including Nickelodeon, Ayer reported.

While the high percentage of adults watching kids TV shows is interesting, it's not very relevant for advertisers buying kids programming, said Deborah Solomon, VP-media research at J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

"We evaluate children's TV shows for the kids that are watching. The adults are tertiary at best," she said.

But it could help advertisers targeting kids and adults.

"A lot of the products on kids shows—food products, athletic shoes and videogames—have broader audience than just kids," Ms. Solomon said. □

Some don't outgrow cartoons

Children 6-11 watched less Saturday morning programming in fourth quarter 1991 than the year before, according to an N W Ayer analysis of Nielsen Media Research data. The three networks lost ratings, while Fox and Nickelodeon improved.

Liquor sales go dry

Recession, taxes blamed for 5.6% decrease

By Gary Levin

For the U.S. liquor industry, 1991 proved to be one of the worst years since Prohibition.

Just one of the top 10 distilled spirits brands—the low-price Seagram's gin—gained sales last year, according to Impact, an industry publication. And Bacardi rum, the No. 1 brand, had its worst sales slide since the 1940s.

Preliminary estimates show total liquor sales fell 5.6% to 147.1 million cases, due to price and tax hikes, the recession and a continued trend toward moderation in drinking.

Unit sales dipped just 0.3% in 1990 because retailers stocked up on inventory to avoid the tax and price hikes. The average volume from 1985 to 1990 was down 2.8%. Industry sales peaked in 1979.

"There's been a lot of trading down from premium brands," said Frank Walters, research director at Impact. "They took big price increases, which have hurt them."

Mr. Walters is calling the 1990s "the age of value," and predicts the lower-price segments of the beverage alcohol business will continue to outperform premium brands.

Impact estimates total 1991 retail sales at $15.5 billion.

Bacardi Imports, whose flagship rum is the top selling liquor brand overall, saw estimated sales volume plummet 10% last year.

Late last month, Bacardi named Lintas:New York to replace McCaffrey & McCall on its rum account and Bacardi Breezer rum-based cooler account, worth a combined $30 million in billings.

In terms of sales declines, "Bacardi is a real shocker," said Nicholas Furlotte, executive editor at Jobson Publishing Corp., another industry publisher.

"It's the first time since World War II that the brand is really down, and it is a very big decline," Mr. Furlotte said.

A Bacardi spokesman said the company posted record profits last year, in part due to the price hikes, but he wouldn't provide details.

Among other highlights, House of Seagram's Seagram's gin posted a 2.9% gain last year, despite an overall decline in the gin business.

The brand, which has proved especially strong in ethnic markets, has successfully broadened its franchise with new advertising, analysts say.

Ogilvy & Mather handles Seagram's gin.

Brown-Forman Corp.'s Canadian Mist whiskey posted a steep percentage decline, falling 8% to 3.35 million cases, while Heublein's popular-price (and little advertised) Popov vodka beat the industry average, dipping just 2.3%.

Sales growth of Carillon Importers' Absolut vodka, one of the few success stories of the 1980s in the liquor industry, slowed again last year, though the brand scored a 2.6% volume gain, in part from increases for its citrus-flavor Absolut Citron.

Jim Beam Brands Co., which bought marketing rights to seven popular-price brands late last year from House of Seagram, is betting on continued strength in that segment.

But Seagram has employed a different strategy by focusing on the upper end of the business.

"Seagram is betting that when the economy bounces back, consumers will go back into premium brands," Impact's Mr. Walters said. □

Tough year for liquor brands

Only one of the top 10 liquor brands had sales growth in 1991, according to preliminary estimates, as a federal excise tax, price hikes and declining consumption hurt sales.

United Distillers shutters unit

By Gary Levin

United Distillers North America has reorganized its liquor business, leaving the agency lineup in doubt.

Amid an industrywide sales slump, the Guinness unit last week said it will close Schenley Industries and move its premium brands, including Dewar's White Label and Pinch scotches, into Schieffelin & Somerset Co., a joint venture between Guinness and Louis Vuitton Moet Hennessy.

Guinness will also create a second unit, to be called Glenmore United Distillers. It will market all of the company's popular-price brands, including some now at Schenley and virtually all of those at Glenmore Distilleries, which will be merged with the new unit. Guinness acquired the company last year.

The reorganization won't affect agency assignments since all brands will remain under the Guinness umbrella and, in most cases, continue with the same brand managers, said Peter Baillie, a Guinness spokesman.

But agency executives expect an eventual consolidation.

Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles the Schenley brands except for Pinch, now at Grey Advertising, New York; Grybauskas & Partners has Glenmore; and Smith/Greenland, Kirshenbaum & Bond and Avrett, Free & Ginsberg share Schieffelin's account.

In 1990, United Distillers spent an estimated $40 million on measured media, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

Schieffelin management will remain intact, but marketing management at Glenmore United Distillers hasn't been named, Mr. Baillie said.

Ian Vale, senior VP-marketing at United Distillers, will name those executives as the reorganization is implemented during the next nine months.

Although a major force in worldwide distilled spirits, United Distillers has no brands among the top 15 in the U.S.

Its largest-selling brand is Gordon's vodka, marketed by Schenley, which fell 10.6% in case sales last year and now ranks 17th among all brands, according to figures from Jobson Publishing Corp. Sales of Dewar's fell 7.2%, and Gordon's gin dropped 6.7% amid an industry slump in which a only a few brands are showing even modest increases.

Among other United brands, Skol vodka fell 15.2% in volume, Johnnie Walker Red Label scotch dipped 8.8% and Tanqueray gin dropped 8.3%, Jobson said. □ snap back together. They can also be strapped into seat belts to avoid breaking up.

Bozell, New York, handles Tyco's $40 million account.

A typical 15-second TV spot starts with one animated dummy saying to another as they're driving in a car: "I feel like a wreck!" The other one replies: "OK!"" Together they deliberately crash into a tree and break into pieces. All six spots end with the message: "Don't you be a dummy. Buckle your seat belt."

Tyco hopes to get a jump on what's expected to be a highly competitive year for boys' action figures in the $13.5 billion toy industry.

"Action figures are going to be a particularly hot area for all toy marketers this year, because although demand for the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles is still strong, that phenomenon is 5 years old and there's room for fresh entrants," said David S. Leibowitz, a toy analyst of American Pine Securities.

The line was created under a licensing agreement with the U.S. Department of Transportation, whose crash dummies Vince and Larry appear in public service announcements sponsored by the department and the Advertising Council. The PSAs are created by Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

"We don't think there will be a problem, as long as the world continues to look at our Vince and Larry public service announcements as completely separate from the advertising for these crash dummy toys," said Brad Lynch, the Ad Council's public relations director. "The fact that Tyco's commercials are animated, for the most part, should help keep the two campaigns distinct, and our hope is that the toy will ultimately increase the awareness of safety among young people." □

TV's Olympic winner

CBS' ratings so far are exceeding guarantees

By Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—CBS is going for the ratings gold with its coverage of the 1992 Winter Olympics in Albertville, France.

For the first six days of coverage, CBS' ratings exceeded the network's expectations and its guarantees to advertisers.

CBS had guaranteed Olympic advertisers a prime-time rating of 17, but ratings for Feb. 8 to 13 averaged 19.1, according to Nielsen Media Research.

That's 2.7% higher than the 18.6 rating ABC averaged for its coverage of the 1988 Winter Olympics in Calgary, Alberta, and 20% higher than the 15.9 rating ABC averaged for its coverage of the 1984 Winter Games in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia.

While CBS' 1992 Olympics ad sales won't directly profit from those high ratings, which are a bonus for Olympics advertisers, they contribute to the network's season-to-date prime-time lead over ABC and NBC.

But perhaps more significantly, CBS' Olympics ratings success is also boosting the overall three-network share for the first time since the mid-1980s. Share figures represent a percentage of households watching TV, while ratings points represent the percentage of all TV households.

The Big 3's season-to-date combined share is 62.7, two-tenths of a point higher than the same period in 1990-91, according to a Network Television Association analysis of data from Nielsen.

Tim McCarver and Paula Zahn anchor CBS' surprisingly successful Olympics broadcast.

"The fact that network share hasn't gone down and appears to have stabilized is significant, because last year at this time . . . the network share was down 4 points," said Rob Frydlewicz, associate media research director at N W Ayer.

For the entire 1990-91 season the combined share for the Big 3 was down 3 points, about a point more than network executives had projected.

Network researchers attributed the extra point loss to several unusual programming factors, including the Persian Gulf War, which drove viewers to alternatives like Cable News Network.

The Big 3's share gain this season isn't coming at the expense of network alternatives, which are either stable or up over last year. Instead, the networks appear to be winning viewers back to TV. The number of TV households watching prime time has increased about 1% this season compared with the same period last year, according to the Network Television Association. The biggest beneficiary is Fox Broadcasting Co., up 3 points to a 13 share.

Basic cable networks are also up 1 point to a 19 share, but unlike last year when CNN was the primary beneficiary of the war, there's no single cable network benefiting from this year's increases.

Share figures for independent TV stations are even with last season at 15.

Among the Big 3 networks, CBS is up 2 share points this season to a 22. ABC and NBC are even with last season, with a 20 and 21 share, respectively.

Although CBS' revenues won't benefit directly from its high Olympic ratings, it will likely help the network sell ad time for its coverage of the 1994 Winter Olympics in Lillehammer, Norway.

CBS said it had sold about half its 1994 Olympics ad time going into Albertville.

By exceeding its ratings guarantees to Olympic advertisers, CBS won't have to give away precious make-good units to those advertisers. □

'Daily News' attracts interest of several potential buyers

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—A bidding war for the troubled Daily News could take shape following last week's distribution of a prospectus to potential buyers and investors.

In a surprise development, New York Post owner Peter Kalikow announced he's ready to make an offer for the News. He hadn't received a prospectus at press time.

News officials said the prospectus was distributed by Salomon Bros. to as many as 10 parties, including Mortimer B. Zuckerman, owner of U.S. News & World Report and The Atlantic. Mr. Zuckerman is believed to be among the most serious potential bidders.

"We got some information, and we're digesting it," said Fred Drasner, president-ceo of U.S. News. "It's still too premature" to determine Mr. Zuckerman's level of interest, he added.

The tabloid News filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December following the unraveling of the late Robert Maxwell's media empire.

The Post's Mr. Kalikow, a real estate developer who declared personal bankruptcy last year, wouldn't disclose terms and conditions of his offer until after reviewing the prospectus. He said his banks knew of his intentions, though it was unclear how he would finance an acquisition.

"It is abundantly clear to me, and anyone familiar with the New York newspaper market, that the surest, and perhaps only, opportunity for the Daily News' survival lies in combination with the New York Post," Mr. Kalikow said in a statement.

Post owner Peter Kalikow says he's interested in buying the Daily News.

In reply, the News released a statement saying, "We welcome expressions of interest from any party who qualifies as a potential investor."

Media analysts, who've long considered the New York newspaper market overcrowded, speculate Mr. Kalikow would merge the papers, giving the Post a much-needed Sunday edition. But they question the wisdom of such a plan.

"Nothing plus nothing equals nothing," said a media analyst who asked not to be named.

The Post has itself been on to the brink of disaster more than once. But Mr. Kalikow said the tabloid has been operating profitably since October 1990, when he won significant labor concessions.

Others mentioned as potential News buyers include Hartz Mountain Corp. Chairman Leonard Stern; News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch; Canadian-based newspaper publisher Conrad Black; financier Marvin Davis; syndicated columnist Percy Ross; and Lord Rothermere, chairman of London's Daily Mail, who in a recent Forbes interview indicated a desire to own a U.S. newspaper.

It wasn't known if any of them received the prospectus.

The prospectus doesn't include an asking price or deadline, said Howard Seife, lawyer for the News creditors' committee. It's believed buyers would be asked only to assume the paper's liabilities.

"If a buyer comes along, it will be an ego buyer and the buy will be contingent on significant labor concessions from the unions," said Andrew Marcus, VP at investment banking company Henry Ansbacher Inc.

Mr. Seife said Salomon Bros. is developing a long-term business plan for the News to emerge from Chapter 11 and continue on its own if a buyer or investor isn't found. □

Papers see signs of ad recovery

By Christy Fisher

Some major newspapers are seeing signs of an upturn in advertising, leaving many hopeful that the worst is over.

Though retail advertising remains in the doldrums for most papers, several report boosts in automotive, help-wanted and real estate ads—often considered the barometers of an economy.

The industry is eager for any hint of an upturn. In 1991, newspapers reported their worst downturn ever in ad revenues and the first two-year decline in the 42 years that ad revenues have been tracked.

The Washington Post in January saw its first increase in recruitment advertising in 40 months; the Chicago Tribune reported its third consecutive month of overall gains in advertising, the first such showing in two years. In addition, the Tribune has bucked the trend by having eight consecutive months of gains in retail advertising.

"Perhaps we have turned a corner in this recession."

The News & Observer of Raleigh, N.C., reported across-the-board increases in advertising in January, up 8% compared with the same period a year ago. Classified ads showed the first increase in two years.

The Milwaukee Journal and Milwaukee Sentinel reported advertising over January budget projections, with increases in financial, travel, auto and employment advertising.

"Though [the uptick] was expected because of the war a year ago, the increases we are seeing are greater than what the war would have allowed," said Durwood Canady, classified advertising director for the Raleigh paper. "Every aspect of our business . . . has shown signs that perhaps we have turned a corner in this recession."

"There's a definite feeling of optimism," said Beverly Klein, senior VP-marketing for the Milwaukee Journal & Sentinel. "We get the feeling from our advertisers that consumers are loosening up. Our customers are doing well in homes and cars, and that's encouraging . . . Those two categories are tremendously important to the economy."

But other newspapers are more cautious.

"It's hard to determine what is truly an

Study finds shows with worst clutter

NBC, Fox have most, says ANA/4A's report

By Joe Mandese

NBC has the most clutter and ABC the least of the Big 3 TV networks, but wide swings occur in the clutter levels of specific shows on all the networks.

Those are the findings of a report released last week by the Association of National Advertisers and the American Association of Advertising Agencies (see detailed chart on Page 61).

While ABC averages 13 minutes, 4 seconds of non-programming time per prime-time hour, its half-hour series "Full House" contains the 1-hour equivalent of 15 minutes, 12 seconds of non-programming time. (In this study, clutter times in half-hour shows are doubled.)

ABC has the least cluttered show of the Big 3: "Civil Wars," which averages only 10 minutes, 4 seconds of non-programming time, the study showed.

NBC has an average of 13 minutes, 51 seconds of clutter per prime-time hour. Its half-hour series "Seinfeld" has the highest clutter of any show on the Big 3 with 16 minutes, 24 seconds. The low is "In the Heat of the Night," with 11 minutes, 42 seconds.

CBS, with an average of 13 minutes, 37 seconds per prime-time hour, has the narrowest range: from 14 minutes, 50 seconds on "Top Cops" down to 12 minutes, 22 seconds on "Knots Landing."

Fox Broadcasting Co. has the highest prime-time clutter average of any broadcast network with 14 minutes, 54 seconds of non-programming time.

Fox's highest single show is the half-hour "Drexell's Class," with 17 minutes, 8 seconds; the lowest is the half-hour series "Herman's Head," with 12 minutes, 12 seconds.

Mennen sale to rock shops

By Pat Sloan

NEW YORK—Colgate-Palmolive Co. will get an immediate and much-needed boost in the U.S. personal products market via its $670 million purchase last week of Mennen Co.

But the deal could mean changes in Mennen's agency roster because of conflicts between Colgate and global competitor Unilever.

Mennen's more than $35 million in spending is split between McCann-Erickson Worldwide and Lowe Group, McCann's sister agency in Interpublic Group of Cos. McCann has the Speed Stick deodorants and Home Expressions Group line of home fragrances, while Lowe has Afta, Skin Bracer and Baby Magic.

McCann and sister shop Lintas:Worldwide are the primary agencies for Unilever's Chesebrough-Pond's unit. That wasn't a problem for Mennen, but Chesebrough markets a variety of deodorant and skincare products that form the global battleground for Unilever and Colgate.

The Mennen acquisition, subject to government approval, is widely seen as a gambit to keep Colgate in the U.S. personal products game. It's an area in which both Unilever and Procter & Gamble Co. have strengthened their hands in the past several years through acquisitions and increased product support.

"I think Colgate realized they were quickly becoming a non-entity in the U.S. personal products business compared to Unilever and P&G, and they had to make some move quickly," said industry consultant Allan Mottus.

Colgate is unlikely to tolerate any agency conflicts as it gears up for battle with P&G and Unilever, agency sources say.

Lowe has no apparent conflicts, agency sources say. But McCann now handles Chesebrough's Vaseline Intensive Care line of skincare products and the company's Pond's facial-care products.

Even if Colgate keeps McCann on the Mennen brands, the agency might face problems with Unilever.

"I think Colgate had to make some move quickly."

"It would be a hard one for Unilever to accept," said one agency source, who added Unilever was already uneasy about McCann's work for L'Oreal cosmetics. McCann is also an agency for personal products marketer Johnson & Johnson.

A Colgate spokesman said there's been no decision on agency assignments.

Colgate's two worldwide agencies, Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, and Young & Rubicam, New York, are hopeful the acquisition means new business for them.

"Colgate has a two-agency policy. I assume we'll split up the Mennen business," said an execu-

Sponsors lash Olympic ambushers

By Joe Mandese and Alison Fahey

Leading sponsors of the Olympics are pressuring the International Olympic Committee to close a loophole that enables network TV advertisers to sport the Olympic rings.

The group, led by the Eastman Kodak Co., wants the committee to stop advertisers from using the so-called "composite logo," which combines the network's logo with the Olympic rings.

"It's being seen as an Achilles' heel for the sponsorship program," said Robert Prazmark, a consultant with ISL Marketing, which markets The Olympic Program of worldwide sponsorships.

"For official sponsors, the existence of the composite logo does present a problem with dilution," said Robert Croog, director of trademark advertising at Kodak. "What it does is blur the distinction between Olympic sponsors and simply the ones that buy time" on the telecast.

The composite logo is used by CBS in broadcast billboards that mention a variety of TV advertisers, thanking them for their support of the Olympic broadcast. Many of those advertisers aren't official Olympic sponsors but have merely bought airtime on the broadcast.

Even though such use of the composite logo is authorized, official sponsors claim it dilutes the value of their sponsorships.

They also complain that some advertisers are making unauthorized use of the composite logo by using it in TV spots and support materials.

Sorry, wrong number

When callers dial Bally's Health & Tennis Corp., they'll find out about Bally's. And Bally's, the nation's largest health-club chain, will find out about them.

Through an automated call-routing system from Western International Media Corp., calls to the 800 numbers listed in Bally's ads are answered by the nearest club.

That makes it easier for a club rep to offer a personal invitation to the prospect, raising the likelihood of a sale.

Western automatically captures the caller's phone number and can cross-reference it to come up with a name and address. That can give Bally's two more ways to pursue a hot lead. based media buying service, developed its phone system after a request by client Bally's. It now offers the system to non-media buying clients.

This month, General Motors Corp.'s Buick Motor Division will invite 150,000 potential customers to play golf and check out cars—via computer.

By booting up Buick's floppy disc on their PCs, prospects can play a simulated round of golf—call it Nintendo for grown-ups—and then look over the latest Buicks. Through text, animated graphics, pictures and sound, they can check the cars' specs and prices.

The disc will be mailed only to prospects who return a direct mail piece or respond to advertising.

Buick intentionally doesn't pass prospects' names on to local dealers.

"We want this to be non-threatening," says Fred Wood, chief operations officer of Inmar Group, a San Antonio, Texas-based sales promotion company that develops Buick interactive software campaigns.

Each annual 150,000-disc mailing leads to sales of "over a thousand" new Buicks, says Nancy Newell, manager of leasing and electronic product information.

800/900: King of the road in marketing value, usage

Two phone lines hold own advantages for promotion, customers

By Junu Bryan Kim

Among interactive media technologies, 800 and 900 telephone services currently can go where others don't—to almost all U.S. households.

None of the other technologies in the interactive arena, which includes computer on-line services, fax bureaus and TV systems, can provide such access to the marketplace.

This access lets almost all U.S. consumers place orders, get information, find dealers, enter sweepstakes and voice opinions, among other things.

Importantly, the numbers also enable sponsors to collect customer data for market trends, databases or customer profiles, within hours or days instead of weeks or months.

Although 800 and 900 numbers are used for similar applications, each number has features that best suit specific marketing goals.

800: Tried and true

The 800 number has become the classic direct response vehicle, for its around-the-clock convenience and because it's free for consumers.

"People are comfortable with it, they understand it and they like it," says Brian Rivette, VP-marketing at Call Interactive, a phone service bureau that handles 800 and 900 calls.

These characteristics make 800 numbers appropriate for sponsors looking to facilitate consumer responses, such as order placement, lead generation and customer service—the three major uses for 800 numbers, according to Strategic Telemedia, an 800 and 900 industry analyst company.

Because the 800 number has been used for more than 25 years, sponsors have few problems with it. Still, potential sponsors must recognize two considerations before establishing 800 service.

The first is the cost. According to a study by market researcher Deloitte & Touche, sponsors of 800 numbers spend $5 billion a year operating these services.

For an individual marketer, the technological aspects alone cost about 25¢ to 32¢ per call-minute.

The final bill, however, represents only part of the expense problem. The bigger headache lies in estimating the number of responses the program will generate, which determines the program's ultimate cost.

NutraSweet Co. predicted 540,000 calls for a five-week promotion last summer and ended up fielding more than 1.5 million responses (see story on Page S-4).

One way sponsors can circumvent this budgeting problem is by enacting a limit on the number of calls made on the line, though the sponsor should mention the limit in promotional materials.

Other ways of reducing—or increasing—the volume of calls involve how the 800

NutraSweet Co., in choosing an 800-number sweepstakes to help celebrate the sweetener's 10th anniversary, decided in favor of goodwill over costs.

Because the promotion was image-oriented, the feeling of goodwill created by an 800 number outweighed any savings from a 900 number, says Victor Imbimbo, president of promotion agency Hadley Group.

The company's key corporate customers were in effect game pieces in the game, in which participants called the number and punched in universal product codes of the 2,000-odd products that contain NutraSweet. That got them a chance to win one of 18,000 prizes and/or trips.

Since NutraSweet has no sales force to implement in-store support, the 800 number was critical to a national promotion. "We've always struggled with how to develop a promotion that will increase volume and serve [food and beverage] customers," says Jim Mitchel, NutraSweet's U.S. marketing director.

The sweepstakes used a two-part phone system with automated and live operators to provide winning and "try again" messages. Consumers who entered the UPC of 12 key products containing the sweetener heard customized messages, such as "Thanks for choosing Diet Coke."

With the 800-number technology being used for the first time, "I had some concerns," Mr. Mitchel says. "But everything worked out phenomenally well."

This promotion marked the first use of a live-and-automated-operator combination answering system in the interactive phone industry, says Phillip Congello, VP-account director at Hadley.

Calls from a Touch-Tone phone went through the automated process with callers punching in a product UPC. Calls from rotary phones were routed to live operators, who pushed the call to the automated system.

Hadley projected 540,000 calls based on the average FSI response rate of 2%, but the promotion generated 1.5 million calls. □ number is presented in promotion materials, Mr. Rivette says.

Simply, the more an 800 number is mentioned or the easier it is to read in an ad, he says, the more calls will be made on it—and vice versa.

900: Passing the buck

A 900 number offers marketers many of the same benefits as 800 numbers, in terms of convenience and instant access to information or sales staffs. But, of course, the consumer pays for the call.

National Association of Information Services, a 900-industry trade group, estimates there are 14,000 lines using 900 numbers currently.

If calls generate enough response, they can even serve as a revenue stream, such as with Playboy's call-in services (see story on Page S-5). Charges for a 900 number have been known to run up to as high as $50 per minute but usually are about $1 per minute.

Perhaps more important, 900 numbers allow marketers to generate qualified responses.

Although the charge might reduce the total volume of calls on the line, the calls eliminated will be from customers who have only a minor interest in what's offered.

"Using a 900 number may give you fewer leads, but they'll give you a higher dollar because more leads are interested," says Bruce Kushnick, president of Strategic Telemedia.

To increase the amount of qualified sales leads it received, Warner Bros. changed its gift catalog giveaway line from an 800 number to a 900 number early last year. On the 800 line, Warner Bros. picked up the expenses of both the call and the catalog. Now, however, the company bills callers $1.50, which helps pay for

Price, media, purpose need resolution first

Undertaking a phone-based interactive service means more than choosing between an 800 or a 900 number.

Before launching a service on either number, sponsoring marketers must do some front-end and back-end preparations.

The questions that need to be answered before the program starts include:

- How much will you pay to receive calls? The charges for 800 and 900 lines are about the same—between 25¢ and 32¢ per call-minute, depending on the service bureau and the number of lines rented. The main difference between 800 and 900 numbers, of course, is that callers "reimburse" sponsors for 900 calls.

However, this question not only addresses the choice between 800 and 900, but it makes sponsors consider whether to answer calls with live or automated operators.

For certain applications, sponsors may want live voices handling calls. But automated systems generally cost between 30% and 40% less than live operators, says Brian Rivette, VP-marketing, Call Interactive.

Hearing is believing for 'Playboy'

By Ira Teinowitz

Playboy says it went into the 900 business to be more responsive to readers. To its amazement, it also found a profit center.

Playboy won't be specific but confirms that last year it generated more than $1 million on its 900 numbers.

These services include comments by centerfold models, polls on the centerfold of the year and answers from the "Playboy Advisor" column in the magazine. The title bases its services, which cost around $3 a minute, on information sought by readers.

Playboy started its 900 service in January 1990 to better reach readers.

"We saw the technology available and saw it as a way to connect more with the editorial product," says Bobbi Gutman, senior VP-circulation and ancillary revenues.

Although the service is a moneymaker, Playboy claims the revenue potential of 900 lines hasn't influenced editorial decisions.

"We offer a connection with the editorial product, which our readers tell us time and time again, by their number, that we are providing a service," Ms. Gutman says.

The title also has helped one advertiser use its lines. Distiller Christian Bros. Sales Co. hired a former Playmate and parodied the "Playboy Advisor" feature with the questions asking when to drink brandy.

Despite its interest in 900 lines, Playboy bans ads from other 900 services.

According to James Spanfeller, associate publisher, the ban is aimed at sex talk lines and was enacted because Playboy had no control over the content of other companies' lines. But, he adds, the ban was in place before Playboy went into the 900 number business.

"For ethical [reasons] and from the business standpoint, we bar them from the book," he says.

However, Mr. Spanfeller says Playboy would consider allowing 900 ads from package-goods companies.

"If someone was doing it for a listing of retailers, we would think of making an exception," he says. □ the call and the catalog.

To generate responses, sponsors must offer something of value to consumers that will justify the call's cost. "It's incumbent on the sponsor to give additional value to callers," Mr. Rivette says.

The item of value can be a coupon or product sample.

Still, 900 numbers have potential problems. Foremost is that the public and many marketers associate 900 numbers with adult-oriented services and fraudulent offers.

Mr. Rivette admits many clients bring up this issue with him when they discuss possible 900 projects. But, he contends, this shady image is slowly fading.

"You see the good guys doing a lot of work with it, and then this image disappears," he says.

Also, adult services comprised only 3% of the calls made last year to 900 services, according to Strategic Telemedia.

Furthermore, as with other business-by-phone operations, nationwide 900 pro-

■ Can you can assess your media support? As responses come in, sponsors should be able to evaluate which ad vehicles have generated calls. This allows sponsors to adjust their media plans.

One way to assess the general media exposure in 800 promotions: Use several 800 lines, with each corresponding to a specific ad.

■ Purpose of assembling data? Sponsors should know beforehand exactly what will be done with the data from callers, whether it's to create a customer profile, construct a database or send literature or product samples. Along these lines, if a database computer program is used, the software must be flexible enough to let sponsors manipulate it as desired. □ igy Services Co. recently called up an ad they wanted to see.

Panasonic Co., which advertises on Prodigy, an interactive on-line personal computer service owned by IBM Corp. and Sears, Roebuck & Co., recently conducted a sweepstakes/survey via the service.

Panasonic's full-screen ad offered Prodigy's 750,000 subscribing households the chance to win a big-screen TV by filling out the on-line survey. Normally, Prodigy runs sponsors' ads across the bottom quarter of the PC screen; subscribers must tap a few keys to see the full, multiscreen ad.

The promotion generated 45,000 responses, giving Panasonic the names, addresses, phone numbers and buying plans of the participants.

Touching, very touching

At Indiana University, students wanting to check out previews of NBC-TV's Thursday night lineup or see if AT&T Co. is the right choice have this information at their fingertips.

Indiana is one of 10 campus sites that last fall received MarketSource Corp.'s InfoSource, interactive kiosks that combine a touch screen, TV, stereo, computer and laserdisc player.

MarketSource, a Cranbury, N.J.-based media and marketing services company, plans this fall to be on more than 100 campuses, which get the kiosks free.

The kiosks show commercials—previews from NBC and Columbia Pictures, for example, and ads from Reebok, AT&T and IBM—shipped monthly on laserdisc as well as campus maps and calendars programmed in by the schools. Costs range from $3,600 for a poster-size ad on the side of one kiosk to $300,000 for a 30-second spot that appears about every 15 minutes.

Students control the programming by touch screen. "College students of the computer and MTV generation are predisposed to this," says Mark Wasserman, InfoSource program manager.

Remote possibilities

With a new gizmo from TV Answer, couch potatoes may soon be able to order a pizza, shop video catalogs and do their banking without taking their eyes off the television.

"We hear all the time [that] this is just making couch potatoes couchier, but it's not," says Paul Sturiale, media relations manager for TV Answer. "It's forcing them to be more active."

As in interactive.

The Federal Communications Commission in January approved two-way interactive video and data services, a technology championed by TV Answer that could allow broadcast and cable programs and commercials to be interactive.

The FCC is likely to begin naming licensees for the technology in major markets within six months, with the first cities up and running by Christmas, Mr. Sturiale says.

As envisioned, consumers will buy a VCR-size, radio wave-controlled box that attaches to the TV set. When a special icon appears on a TV show or commercial, viewers will know they can interact via remote control and, for example, request information or play a game show. Consumers also will be able to do home banking and shopping.

TV Answer hasn't signed any deals yet with licensees, advertisers or programmers. Mr. Sturiale says the anticipated $500 price of the box won't be a stumbling block.

"We think there are plenty of consumers at that price point," he says. □

Scott Hume contributed to this report.

This multiscreen ad/survey, which ran on Prodigy, gave Panasonic the names and addresses of 45,000 potential TV buyers.

grams must meet regulations by the Federal Communications Commission and states.

Another potential trouble spot sponsors must recognize involves marketing a 900 program to those under 18.

Video Jukebox Network, an interactive music video cable network, incorporates a number of precautions, including reminders for those under 18 to obtain parental permission before calling and a preamble at the start of the call stating how much it costs. It also allows callers to end the call before charges are incurred.

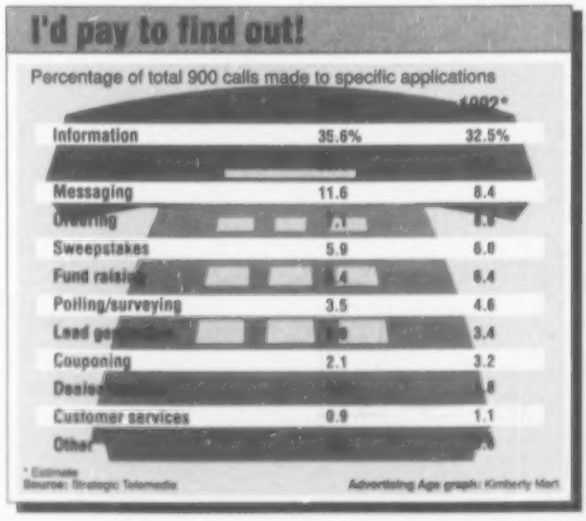
Certain such procedures were mandated by the FCC late last year, but the network has had them in place since its inception, says Andrew Orgel, president-ceo of Video Jukebox, available to 13 million cable homes as it celebrates its third anniversary.

Callers who enter the wrong song number can cancel their selection without any charge (viewer requests cost between $2 and $3 depending on how many videos are requested or if a call is made to the live or automated operator). The network also operates a 24-hour, toll-free line and offers free blockage of interactive phone services to any home.

Although 800 and 900 numbers have individual benefits, sponsors might find neither fully suits their needs. The best choice might be to use both services, as Lotus has done.

Mr. Kushnick predicts there will be an increase in the number of sponsors using both services as companies look to meet their customers' different assistance needs.

"Companies shouldn't be monolithic when making one or the other their decision," Mr. Kushnick says. □



Magazines lose at newsstand

Sales drop forces lower rate bases

By Ira Teinowitz

Many magazines suffered reduced newsstand sales in the second half of 1991, and lower rate bases will result.

While figures in the Audit Bureau of Circulations' FAS-FAX report show newsstand sales declines for many magazines, some were able to bolster results with subscription gains.

Magazines that rely heavily on newsstand sales, most notably First for Women, Woman's World, TV Guide, Woman's Day, Family Circle and the Star, suffered the most.

"Single-copy sales by every member seem to be somewhat depressed. They are somewhat soft," said Joe Cece, publisher of News America Publications' TV Guide. "I think in large part it's the general recessionary pressure. I don't think there is less interest in magazines."

"The economy hasn't bounced back as quickly as we had hoped," said Craig J. Vander Ploeg, managing director of the Magazine Consultancy, which handles marketing for Bauer Publishing titles, including First for Women and Woman's World. "We think newsstand continues to be weak, and it's affecting us because 100% of our circulation is single-copy."

First for Women saw circulation drop 33.4% in the second half of 1991 to 1,764,430, compared with the same period a year ago. Some of the drop was due to First's switch to eight issues in the period from six the year before. When a magazine boosts frequency, each issue is on the newsstand for a shorter time, and this can hurt sales.

First failed to meet its 2.5 million rate base, and will lower it to 1.5 million with the March issue. It will increase frequency to 16 times this year from 14 last year, and plans to go every-other-weekly in 1993, Mr. Vander Ploeg said. He wouldn't say whether Bauer is considering subscription sales.

Woman's World's circulation fell 15% to 1,279,280—below its 1.3 million rate base.

TV Guide, whose total circulation fell 3.5% to 15,053,018 after single-copy sales slid 6.1%, also failed to make its 15.2 million rate base. It will lower the rate base to 14 million in March in expectation of a further sales drop as the cover price rises to 89¢ from 79¢.

The New York Times Co.'s Family Circle dropped 8.1% at the newsstand and 6.8% overall, though still above its lowered 5 million rate base. Newsstand sales of Hachette's Woman's Day dropped 10.3%; overall sales fell 3.8%. Publisher Bob Mate attributed the drop to publishing eight issues in the period vs. seven in 1990.

Enquirer/Star Group's Star saw circulation drop 9.6% to 3,102,026, well below its 3.5 million rate base.

Other magazines weathered the recession better.

Meredith Corp.'s Ladies' Home Journal was off 11.8% in the small portion of its circulation from newsstand sales but saw overall circulation rise 1.3%. Washington Post Co.'s Newsweek saw newsstand sales slip 2.6%, but overall sales rose 0.4%.

Among the few publications to see a rise in single-copy sales was The New York Times Co.'s McCall's, whose newsstand sales jumped 37.3% after a redesign, helping boost circulation 0.9% despite a drop in subscriptions. Time Inc. Magazine Co.'s Sports Illustrated boosted newsstand sales 17.1%; overall circulation rose 2.4%.

The latest report was the first to document free circulation of largely paid-circulation titles and the first to list more than fragmentary results from unpaid publications that the bureau recently agreed to audit.

The audit bureau's rival, Business Publications Audit of Circulation, also reported results, which included a 37.3% decrease in circulation for TVSM's The Cable Guide. The publication has switched from free to paid circulation for many cable subscribers. BPA also reported that Sports Illustrated for Kids grew 3.6% in paid circulation (to 635,318) and 2.7% in overall circulation. □

Advertisers favor cable; network TV loses ground

NEW YORK—Advertisers say cable TV is becoming more effective while network TV is losing its shine.

A nationwide survey of 102 advertisers found cable TV is the medium whose effectiveness is strengthening the most over time. The January survey concluded network TV is the medium whose effectiveness is declining most.

"We continue to see an erosion in advertisers' confidence in network television as an effective medium," said Gene DeWitt, president of DeWitt Media, which conducted the study.

About 30% of respondents said cable TV is improving most. Direct mail ranked second in ad effectiveness growth, followed by network radio and magazines.

A quarter of respondents said network TV is losing effectiveness most, followed by newspapers, spot TV and magazines.

The wide-ranging study also found 52% of respondents plan to increase ad spending this year but not because of media inflation—two-thirds said 1992 political and Olympics ad spending won't inflate prices.

Moreover, most respondents said their increased spending was unlikely to go into the network TV upfront market. About 31% said they plan to spend less in the 1992-93 upfront market; 51% said they plan to spend the same as last year.

Those spending less on network upfront plan to cut budgets or shift money to cable TV, the network scatter market, magazines, spot TV and syndication. □

MEDIA MIX

News briefs on print, electronic and alternative media.

No prime-time erosion. Quelling speculation that one or more of the Big 3 networks might reduce prime-time schedules to 15 hours weekly from 22, the heads of two networks called that move unlikely. "We have no serious plans at this time to cut back," said Capital Cities/ABC President-CEO Daniel Burke last week at the annual TV advertising forum of the Association of National Advertisers. While he and NBC President-CEO Robert Wright noted the "bottom third" of the prime-time schedule is unprofitable, Mr. Wright said, "You never know which [third] it will be."

Passive resistance. Nielsen Media Research has the technology to conduct "passive" measurement of TV viewing, but implementation will depend on consumer acceptance, said John Holt, chairman-ceo of A.C. Nielsen Co. While some believe passive ratings meters would overcome some problems plaguing current people meter technology—including low response rates and questionable children ratings data—Mr. Holt said some households might consider the passive meter intrusive. Separately, Nielsen plans to conduct a major study on out-of-home TV viewing, sponsored by the Network Television Association.

Nickelodeon teems with NBA. Nickelodeon is testing sports programming for kids with six half-hour series produced by NBA Entertainment. The series are hosted by kids and focus on sports personalities and activities. The series will serve as a test for a weekly, magazine-format sports program for next winter.

ESPN signs promotion deals. ESPN Home Video, a division of the cable TV sports network, has signed separate promotional agreements with Kraft General Foods; Pennzoil Co.; AT&T Co.; and Coca-Cola USA in conjunction with BP Oil. The marketers will use ESPN's sports videos in national consumer promotions this year. □

IF YOU THOUGHT GREAT BEACHES WERE TAMPA BAY'S ONLY DRAW . . .

You've been out in the sun too long.

While miles of unspoiled beaches and near-perfect weather have made Tampa Bay a popular tourist destination, the area offers much more than sun and sand.

One of the nation's fastest-growing metro areas, Tampa Bay has now become Florida's #1 metro in population, #1 in households, #1 in effective buying income, and #1 in retail sales. In the past year alone, Coca-Cola Refreshments Co., and Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. announced plans to locate new operations in the Tampa area.

So it's not surprising that younger people keep moving to Tampa Bay — population has been growing by 125 people every day through the last decade.

And it's not surprising either that Tampa Bay keeps up with the Times. The St. Petersburg Times, Tampa Bay's largest newspaper, beats The Tampa Tribune in metro circulation by more than 106,000 papers daily and 122,500 on Sunday.

So catch the new wave of growth in Tampa Bay. Call 1-800-333-7505, ext. 8249, for your copy of the 1992 Life and Times of Tampa Bay, containing the latest information on the thriving Tampa Bay market and the newspaper that serves it best.

Ketchum slips in Japan, stresses N.Y.

By Jon Lafayette and David Kilburn

Ketchum Advertising's ambitious international expansion plans have hit a snag in Japan, but the agency is still moving to raise its profile in the U.S.

Ketchum's Tokyo office is in danger of collapse after losing six accounts totaling as much as $32 million in billings over the past three years.

But in the U.S., the agency is moving its headquarters to the New York office from Pittsburgh after 70 years in a drive to snare more business from midsize clients. The Pittsburgh office will remain open; parent Ketchum Communications will maintain its headquarters there.

Ketchum's growth has included establishing offices last year in France, Germany, Taiwan, Indonesia, Hong Kong and Canada.

Later this year, Ketchum hopes to establish an affiliation with an agency in Spain and is targeting Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Thailand, India and Brazil for 1993.

Jan Hedquist, Ketchum International managing director, said Japan is a critical market for Ketchum but the office might be closed because most of its business is gone.

"You can't scale back there because it's very labor intensive," he said, adding that Ketchum might try to keep the office open by selling a portion to local businessmen or by making an arrangement with a Japanese agency. A decision is expected as soon as this week.

In the past three years, the office has lost most of its business to other, more established international agencies.

The final blow came last month when Rothmans International quietly moved its Dunhill cigarette to DDB Needham Japan, a source said. The account size couldn't be determined, but industry sources say it was significant.

Kroyer

In 1989, Ketchum's Tokyo operation lost the White Horse Scotch whisky account, Blue Nun wine and Grand Marnier to Leo Burnett-Kyodo Co. Early last year, Mizua Porsche left Ketchum for Grey-Daiko and the agency's biggest account, Hennessy cognac, moved to Burnett.

In the U.S., Ketchum Advertising USA President Bob Kroyer said the headquarters move is being made to tap into midsize clients looking for midsize agencies.

He said a Harris poll indicated several such clients with billings of $10 million to $30 million are looking more to midsize agencies than to large shops.

"That's the kind of client that will fit right in at Ketchum," Mr. Kroyer said. "That will be an important client to Ketchum and won't be so big as to be dominant or so small as to get lost."

As a whole, Ketchum is a fairly large agency with 1990 worldwide billings of $1.03 billion. In the U.S., Ketchum bills $944 million. Besides New York and Pittsburgh, Ketchum has major offices in San Francisco and Los Angeles.

But the agency has a fairly low national profile because each of its domestic offices has operated autonomously. And while Ketchum's West Coast operations are known for campaigns for DHL Worldwide Express and American Honda Motor Co.'s Acura division, the New York office has lacked a distinctive personality.

Last year, Ketchum tried to change that by hiring Steve Penchina from Penchina, Selkowitz as executive creative director. The transition continued late last year when Chairman Hank Seiden left the agency. Mr. Seiden had served as the de facto creative director, and the chairman's post hasn't been filled.

Now, "our intent is to help the New York office grow over the next three to five years into a major entity in the marketplace," Mr. Kroyer said.

Ketchum has increased the New York new-business budget and added two new-business development staffers. Ketchum executives are also planning training programs for its junior staffers. In the past, only media department staffers got formal training. □ including commercials, public service announcements, promos, billboards and program credits.

The study marks the first time specific programs were scrutinized for their clutter levels. However, a previous ANA/Four A's study revealed that on average, all three networks had increased the amount of commercial time between 1990 and 1991.

The clutter issue has come under fire from advertisers that fear their commercial messages are losing impact as the amount of non-programming time increases.

"It is essential that advertisers use these data as an additional tool in negotiating with networks, syndicators and cable networks," said Richard Kostyra, exec VP-U.S. director of media services at J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, who spearheaded the clutter research project.

The report also lists the clutter levels of specific Big 3 network daytime and late-night programs, prime-time Fox programs, selected syndicated programs and daypart averages for five major cable networks.

The data are based on monitoring by Nielsen Media Research and Advertising Information Services conducted Nov. 18 to 24, 1991.

Mr. Kostyra said the ANA and Four A's plan to release the report twice annually and that the next report is tentatively scheduled for this spring.

The Network Television Association maintained that clutter levels on network TV are still less than on other broadcast media.

"The three broadcast networks still have the least amount of clutter of any television medium —less clutter than cable, independents and syndication," said Suzanne Worden, VP-director of public relations. □ improvement or a reaction to a really bad January last year as a result of the war," said Nick Cannistraro Jr., VP-advertising and marketing for the Post. "Yes, we had a pretty good January. The real question is will it hold up after the war effect [is factored out]. If we see strength in February or March, we may be climbing out" of the recession.

"There's some activity that has us smiling for the first time."

"We are in somewhat of an upturn [in real estate and employment linage], but I'm not ready to call it an upturn yet," said Jim Currow, VP-sales & marketing for The Miami Herald. "We're seeing positive signs at the end of January and continuing into February. But two weeks a trend does not make."

Jim Marchal, VP-advertising for Gannett Co. agreed.

"It's difficult to make significant comparisons in January and February because of the war in 1991," he said, noting that Gannett has seen improved classified advertising since summer with more automotive and real estate ads and smaller declines in help-wanted.

"We think the March and April period will determine whether its a full-fledged recovery," he said.

Newsday has seen upturns in automotive and real estate classified but not help-wanted or retail.

"If the first five or six weeks of the year are any indication, there's some activity that has us smiling for the first time," said Robert M. Johnson, publisher-ceo of Newsday and New York Newsday. "I think things have to start turning around this year, but I don't think we'll see anything of any significance until the second half. If I see these ticks for two or three months in a row, I'll feel a lot better than if it's just a momentary blip."

"We are not overly optimistic about a turnaround in the first quarter," said Elaine Lintecum, corporate financial analyst for McClatchy Newspapers, which owns The Sacramento (Calif.) Bee and 10 other dailies primarily on the West Coast.

Stock market analysts who study the newspaper business are expressing some optimism.

Newspaper ad revenues are expected to increase about 2.5% for 1992, with the first half remaining flat and about a 5% improvement in the second half, reports Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette. This is a significant improvement over the 6.8% decline to $30.1 billion reported last year.

C.J. Lawrence, Morgan Grenfell, an investment company, is predicting that earnings per share for nine major newspaper companies will be up more than 20% for the first quarter, compared with the same period the year before.

Newspapers' improved performance is due primarily to aggressive cost-cutting in the past two years, particularly newsprint prices and personnel. □

FDA label plans under attack

By Steven W. Colford and Julie Liesse

The food industry this week is coming down hard against key elements of proposed labeling regulations that may threaten well-known brand names like Healthy Choice and Lean Cuisine.

The regulations, proposed by the Food & Drug Administration and U.S. Department of Agriculture, define words like "light," set standard serving sizes and specify which health claims can and can't be used.

The comment period ends Feb. 25; barring delays, the regulations will become final in November, with compliance required by May.

The regulations could "define out of existence" brand names such as Healthy Choice, said Hugh Latimer, a Washington attorney whose firm represents several major food marketers including Kraft General Foods and Stouffer Foods Corp.

Marketers appear to be divided on which proposals are the most onerous.

Grand Metropolitan Food Sector, which includes Pillsbury and Haagen-Dazs Co., will point to definitions of "low fat" and "serving sizes" and additional labeling requirements as

KGF experiments

'Alternative pricing' sets off new questions

By Julie Liesse and Judann Dagnoli

Kraft General Foods last week said it is experimenting with "alternative pricing" in some product categories, as the "everyday low pricing" controversy continues to split marketers and retailers.

Although Procter & Gamble Co. is the only marketer to make a real commitment to the strategy, KGF admitted it adopted in some categories "lower deal rates and list prices," and has been doing it over the past two years.

That acknowledgment came in a statement issued to clarify a report in The New York Times that the No. 1 U.S. food marketer felt was saying it had adopted an everyday low pricing strategy.

"We haven't done anything like that" to adopt a major policy change on everyday low pricing, Kraft General Foods Senior VP-Sales Joseph Durrett wrote in a letter that he said was intended to

"The rest of the industry would like nothing more than for P&G to be the blocking back."

"set the record straight" for the company's retail customers. "And we have no plans to do it."

In a presentation by Philip Morris Cos. Chairman-CEO Michael A. Miles before securities analysts in Florida earlier in the week, Mr. Miles said KGF, rocked by the recession, has reduced retail prices of some products and will consider reducing others to "defend our businesses."

Most major package-goods marketers are looking hard at everyday low pricing as an alternative to expensive trade promotion. That's what P&G did last year when it eliminated promotional allowances for a variety of products in favor of giving retailers a permanent "everyday low" list price. Other marketers now are waiting to see what happens.

"The average package-goods manufacturer's business is so hung up in incremental trade support that the inclination of every ceo in the U.S. is to move to ev-

Time's new chief could boost titles

By John Wolfe

NEW YORK—The strategic direction of Time Warner's publishing division is expected to remain intact and could even get a boost following a high-level corporate shake-up at the media giant.

Nicholas

In a surprise announcement last week, Time Warner President and Co-CEO N.J. Nicholas Jr. resigned and was replaced by Vice Chairman-Chief Operating Officer Gerald M. Levin, a 20-year Time Inc. veteran.

Until his abrupt resignation, Mr. Nicholas, 52, had been considered the heir apparent to Time Warner Chairman and Co-CEO Steven J. Ross. Mr. Levin is now expected to assume that role.

Mr. Levin, 52, began his career at Time Warner's Home Box Office unit and has never worked for the company's magazine division, which publishes Time, People,

Rival ratings don't match up

By Joe Mandese

CBS may be the No. 1 prime-time network, according to Nielsen Media Research, but the Tiffany network is dead last among the Big 3 according to ScanAmerica, a new network ratings service launched last fall by Arbitron Co.

With an average 13.4 prime-time rating for Oct. 28 to Nov. 24, ABC boasts a commanding lead over third-place CBS' 11.8 and second-place NBC's 12.6 in ScanAmerica's first network report.

Fox Broadcasting Co., though still fourth overall among the broadcast networks, also did significantly better with the new ratings service. Fox logged an average 9.9 prime-time rating vs. 7.7 from Nielsen.

Network and agency researchers cautioned that the new service isn't yet nationally projectable, as Nielsen is. ScanAmerica now operates with a sample of only 1,000 households in five major markets.

But they noted that even when ScanAmerica expands to a nationally projectable sample of 2,000 households next year, they expect significant differences between its ratings and Nielsen's.

"Theoretically, we should get the same type of data, but realistically we probably never will," said Larry Hyams, director of

LAST MINUTE NEWS

Bush plots strategy for Georgia primary

WASHINGTON—President Bush will rely on advertising and surrogates to attack conservative Republican Pat Buchanan in the March 10 Georgia presidential primary. Sources said after the president won the Feb. 18 New Hampshire Republican primary by a narrower than expected margin, some of his campaign advisers argued for an anti-Buchanan offensive. By late last week, advisers instead were leaning toward a strategy that "President Bush should not engage and be pissy and petty with Pat Buchanan," said Don Sipple, one of the president's admen. "But it's still an open question as to how much we go after Buchanan with ads and with surrogates." A new Bush TV spot was slated to break today in Georgia.

Hasbro rethinks buying assignments

NEW YORK—Hasbro is expected to shuffle $90 million in national broadcast media buying among several agencies within the next two weeks, sources said. The toy marketer is expected to redistribute agency of record assignments for broadcast network, syndication and cable buys among Griffin Bacal, Grey Advertising and possibly Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor. GM stalls spending

'92 plans reflect budget tightening, recession

By Raymond Serafin

General Motors Corp. is holding the line on 1992 ad budgets, with total spending expected to be flat or slightly down compared with the estimated $1.2 billion spent in 1991.

Insiders, including several at GM and its agencies, say ad spending plans are still subject to changes, but working budgets reflect GM's concerns about reining in all of its costs.

The decisions weren't unexpected in light of Chairman Robert Stempel's dramatic Dec. 18 news conference outlining plans to scale down the company by 1995 by closing 21 plants and slashing 74,000 jobs, 18.7% of GM's total employment.

Last fall, Philip Guarascio, executive-in-charge of corporate marketing and advertising, predicted ad budgets could increase about 3% for 1992. But that was before the continuing slump in sales brought about GM's drastic budget tightening. Mr. Guarascio wasn't available to discuss the current status of budgets.

Although there aren't any massive cuts in spending, ad executives are disappointed that the carmaker isn't capitalizing on a chance to rebuild market share in light of a slew of new products launched last fall and the current "Buy American" sentiment that's made some consumers more receptive to domestic nameplates.

"There's a lot of frustration in the divisions. They're not getting what they wanted," said one media source.

Because GM executives put a premium on new-product launches, some of the divisions fared better than others in the budget process. Indications are that Pontiac, Buick and possibly Oldsmobile will spend at about the same levels as 1991 to carry through key product launches, with other divisions taking spending cuts.

"GM has been scrutinizing every budget, especially the out-of-pocket spending like advertising," said one agency source. "The company is operating on the premise that the economy and auto sales will get better as the year goes along but not dramatically better."

GM's ad budgets climbed fast during the late 1980s, as the car-

Big push for Sunchips

By Jennifer Lawrence

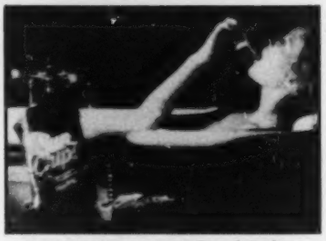
Frito-Lay today starts a $30 million marketing push for Sunchips multigrain snacks, a record-breaking budget for any Frito-Lay product in its second year.

PepsiCo's snack food division wants to make Sunchips a megabrand like its $1 billion Doritos line.

It's off to a good start. Sunchips, the first multigrain snack introduced in the U.S., achieved astounding sales results in its first year of national distribution, when it was backed by $30 million. Retail sales in 1991 were in excess of $100 million. Very few new food products achieve $40 million to $50 million in sales during their first year.

The big Sunchips marketing push comes as Frito-Lay prepares to get some competition in the multigrain snack segment.

Borden will introduce a new multigrain snack "during the second quarter in about one-third of the country," George Waydo, president of Borden's Snacks &



Sunchips' new spots break today.

International Consumer Products Division, revealed last week at a consumer analysts meeting in Florida. Rollout will be completed in early 1993.

W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich., will handle advertising for the new product.

Keebler Co. is also expected to introduce a multigrain snack, said George Thompson, an analyst at Prudential Securities.

"We think Sunchips could be the Doritos of the '90s," said Dwight Riskey, Frito-Lay VP-marketing.

Frito-Lay will introduce the new campaign, featuring a new Sunchips flavor called Harvest Cheddar, with heavy network TV advertising including a vertical roadblock of CBS' entire Monday night prime-time lineup. The company for the first time will advertise on the Grammy Awards show, airing Feb. 25.

Tonight, Frito-Lay will unveil five 15-second network TV spots for the Sunchips brand with the tag "A little sun never tasted so good." The campaign is the first from BBDO Worldwide, New York, which took the business from Levine, Huntley, Vick & Beaver when Roger Enrico returned to PepsiCo's snack foods division as chairman.

The effort also incorporates Frito-Lay's largest ever direct mail sampling program with 6 million households getting samples of the new Sunchips Harvest Cheddar flavor and Original flavor. □

Dooner rises at McCann

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—John J. Dooner Jr. last week was named president-chief operating officer of McCann-Erickson Worldwide, his third key post at the giant global agency and likely not his last.

Mr. Dooner, 43, remains president of McCann's North American operations and its New York office. He assumes the presidency from Robert L. James, who remains McCann Worldwide chairman-ceo; the post of chief operating officer is new.

In his new post, Mr. Dooner becomes the No. 2 executive at the agency. Previously, he'd been one of five regional directors reporting to Mr. James. All the regional directors will eventually report to Mr. Dooner, Mr. James said.

"Dooner is a guy who is really ready to expand his scope of operations at a time when it's good for us to have extra help" at the worldwide level, Mr. James said. "We need it because over time we've grown pretty well, and we have thin lines of management."

Although Mr. James, 57, said he doesn't plan to retire soon, Mr. Dooner could well be his eventual successor.

"I have no doubt he has that capability," Mr. James said. "He's always amazed me with his ability to grasp things quickly and develop a high proficiency rapidly. That's what the demands are in these times."

Dooner

The aggressive Mr. Dooner personifies McCann's approach to the agency business.

"We've got a 'roll up our sleeves and get involved' personality, and that's very relevant today," Mr. Dooner said. "A no BS, problem-solving group of people is what clients want to work with today. I am totally convinced that within a short period of time, we'll be the No. 1 agency in the world."

McCann's New York office grew to just over $1 billion in 1991 from about $300 million in 1984, when Mr. Dooner arrived, mostly by winning new assignments from the agency's global clients, including General Motors Corp., Nestle and Unilever. McCann's worldwide billings were $5.7 billion in 1991, up 8% over the previous year.

In the past year, McCann has also created specialized units to serve special client needs, such as the Comcord Group, which coordinates Nestle USA's $300 million in media buying, and McCann/-SAS, Troy, Mich., a unit that acts as general contractor for GM's GMC Truck unit.

Mr. Dooner said that eventually he will replace himself as head of either the North American or New York unit but added that he doesn't have a candidate in mind. □

JANUARY AD RESULTS

Ad pages still sliding

Tobacco print spending declines dramatically

By Scott Donaton

Cigarette/tobacco advertising fell dramatically in January, knocking it from the top 10 magazine ad categories.

Seven of the top 10 categories ranked by revenue were down in pages in January. Cigarette advertising, which ranked No. 8 for most of last year, fell to No. 11. Ad pages for the category dropped 44.3% to 167.5; revenues fell 43.7% to $10.6 million.

Consumer magazines' January ad pages fell for the third straight year.

Magazines tracked by Publishers Information Bureau carried a combined 9,425 ad pages for the month, down 3.6% from January 1991 (AA, Feb. 17). Ad revenues fell 2.6% to $367.9 million.

Publishers began expecting a weak January late last year, with one in November saying, "I wish we didn't have a January issue."

While the overall page decline wasn't severe, January was quite harsh for a number of major magazines, particularly women's and upscale titles.

Two titles saw pages fall by a disturbing 50%-plus. Gourmet's 43.5 pages were down 50.3%; Mirabella's 21 pages marked a 57.9% drop.

Among upscale magazines, Architectural Digest carried 69.2 ad pages, down 16.1%; Bon Appetit fell 18.5% to 47 pages; Travel & Leisure carried 45.2 pages, down 32.7%; and Food & Wine carried 26 pages, down 24.6%.

In the women's field, Glamour's 43.5 pages fell 36.4%; Working Woman also carried 43.5 pages, a 32.9% drop; New Woman was down 17.4% to 36 pages; and Mademoiselle's 33.9 pages slid 57.9%.

Fashion category leader Vogue carried 72.6 pages in January, a drop of 21%. Elle, with 55.6 pages, was down 7.1%; Harper's Bazaar fell 32.6% to 29 pages.

Time Warner's weeklies posted mixed results. Flagship Time's 115.7 pages were down 29.9%; People was down 23.8% to 143.3 pages. Sport Illustrated's 123.1 pages were down just 5.2%, while 2-year-old Entertainment Weekly's 50.7 pages marked a 21.6% gain.

"Our bookings still aren't so great. It's not going to be a great first quarter," said Reginald K. Brack Jr., chairman, president and ceo of Time Inc. Magazine Co. But "we're still hearing good things about the year in general" and a turnaround could happen in the second half, he said.

Newsweek carried 116.7 pages last month, up 16.3%, while U.S. News & World Report was flat with 82.7 pages, a 0.6% drop.

Business titles were fairly strong in January. Forbes was down a mere 0.3% with 222.8 pages; Business Week saw pages rise 10.5% to 181.1; and Fortune was up 13.8% with 108.9 pages. Financial World's pages increased 204.3% to 95.6.

Among Sunday magazines, Parade was up 10.9% to 65.5 pages; USA Weekend rose 39.2% to 62.7 pages.

Other individual bright spots included: American Health (42 ad pages, up 34.1%); Conde Nast Traveler (69.4 pages, up 42.5%); The Economist (174.4 pages, up 34.7%); Endless Vacation (33.1 pages, up 34.7%); Field & Stream (57.8 pages, up 33.4%); Home (37.8 pages, up 73.5%); National Geographic Traveler (41.2 pages, up 27.1%); Sassy (32.4 pages, up 64.9%); and Vanity Fair (49.2 pages, up 21.6%). □

Whittle, Colgate set dental title

News briefs on print, electronic and alternative media.

Whittle makes dental appointment. Whittle Communications, Knoxville, Tenn., launched with a spring issue In Touch, a 98,000 controlled-circulation magazine for dental hygienists solely sponsored by Colgate-Palmolive Co.'s Colgate oral-care products. It will also launch a Dental Health Adviser program sponsored by Colgate that includes wall posters sent to 35,000 dentists' offices.

CBS profits down. CBS reported fourth-quarter 1991 profits were $9.4 million; sales were up 2% to $937.4 million from fourth-quarter 1990. For the full year, CBS reported a loss of $98.7 million, with sales of $3.04 billion down 7%. CBS attributed the weak performance to a poor advertising economy and troubles with its TV network operations, including large losses from sports programming.

Racer sues MTV. Race car driver Mike Smith, who heads London-based Target International, has filed a $6.5 million lawsuit in Los Angeles Superior Court against MTV Networks, alleging the cable company breached a contract with Mr. Smith under which he would develop a sports marketing program called "Concert-On-Sports." Advertisers could sponsor events and buy airtime on MTV Networks. Mr. Smith claims MTV struck deals with advertisers, manufacturers and others, based on his ideas, and that he was not justly compensated. The claim alleges breach of good faith and fair dealing, fraud, conspiracy, negligent misrepresentation and racketeer-influenced practices, among other charges. MTV doesn't comment on pending lawsuits.

Blockbuster subs title. Blockbuster Entertainment Corp., Fort Lauderdale, Fla., plans to discontinue Blockbuster but intends to introduce a reformatted, retitled magazine this year. Blockbuster each month sells or distributes an average 997,568 copies of the monthly.

Family Circle* plays TV. "CBS This Morning" and Family Circle have teamed for a joint production using material from Family Circle to produce TV segments on CBS. CBS and The New York Times Co.'s Women's Magazine Group, Family Circle's parent, recently formed a cross-media partnership.

Southern Accents* slows frequency. Southern Progress Corp., Birmingham, Ala., will reduce Southern Accents' frequency to every other monthly from 10 times yearly with its July/August issue.

Tribune Co. properties team for event. The Chicago Tribune and WGN-AM are jointly marketing the Heartland America Family Airshow Festival, scheduled for Aug. 7 to 9 in West Chicago, Ill. The two Tribune Co. units are selling sponsorship packages and seeking a presenting sponsor.

Growing trend. RTW Review, a Milwaukee-based fashion industry trade publication, introduces with its April issue a monthly supplement that carries advertising, a first for the title. The supplement expands editorial from women's fashion to include men's and children's fashion and home furnishings.

Fox expands in Memphis. Fox Broadcasting Co. affiliate WPTY-TV, Memphis, Tenn., this year will add a sixth night of Fox programming and a seventh night next year. That follows Clear Channel Communications' purchase of the station from Chase Communications for $21 million. Clear Channel has 16 radio and six TV stations in 15 markets. □ audience analysis at ABC. Mr. Hyams noted there already are great disparities in the ratings produced by Nielsen's and Arbitron's local-market ratings services, which are virtually identical in sample size and orientation.

ScanAmerica

ScanAmerica's network ratings aren't the first to differ from Nielsen's. AGB Research operated a short-lived national ratings service in the U.S. that shut down in July 1988, after less than a year, due to lack of industry support after delivering figures that differed from Nielsen's.

But differences in AGB's and Nielsen's network ratings raised serious questions from agency and network researchers about the validity of both.

"To the extent that there are differences between Nielsen and ScanAmerica, there will probably be some debate about whether they are real or artificial. And that will lead to confusion," said Dave Poltrack, senior VP-marketing and research at CBS, the first and only network to subscribe to ScanAmerica.

Young & Rubicam and Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. also subscribe to ScanAmerica's network service.

If the initial ScanAmerica data are any indication, confusion should abound once again.

According to Nielsen, the No. 1 network prime-time show in November was CBS' "60 Minutes" with a 22.6 rating. But ScanAmerica listed ABC's "Roseanne" as the No. 1 show with a 21.1 rating.

Even more dramatic discrepancies occurred between the two services.

Nielsen ranked NBC's "Cheers" as the No. 3 prime-time show with a 19.5 rating, but ScanAmerica ranked it No. 8 with a 17.9 rating. And Nielsen ranked CBS' "Murphy Brown" No. 5 with a 19.1 rating, while ScanAmerica put it at No. 15 with a 16.9.

Overall, ScanAmerica and Nielsen each rank eight shows in their top 20 list that don't appear on the other service's list.

Network researchers attribute some differences to the regional skew of ScanAmerica's sample, dispersed among New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Dallas and Atlanta.

Mr. Hyams said the same was true for Fox's strong performance in the ScanAmerica ratings, which list Fox's "In Living Color," "Beverly Hills, 90210" and "Married . . . With Children" in its top 20 list. Nielsen has no Fox series in its top 20.

Mr. Poltrack said CBS is about three months away from making "legitimate comparisons" between the Nielsen and ScanAmerica data. But he said CBS' primary interest in ScanAmerica isn't in its conventional household ratings but in its product usage information.

Unlike Nielsen, ScanAmerica also issues data on the product usage of the audiences of specific network shows.

Based on October data, for example, Fox's "The Simpsons" was only the 18th highest show in terms of household ratings, but among users of cold remedies, it ranked No. 7. And ABC's "Step by Step" ranked only 14th in ScanAmerica's household ratings but No. 9 among users of trash bags.

"If we can show that one show has a greater composition of diet cola users over another show, then that is a relative qualitative advantage for that show," Mr. Poltrack said. □

Labels

key problem areas.

For example, the proposals define low fat as food with less than 3 grams of fat per serving, which is acceptable "although we'd like 4 grams instead," said Guy Johnson, director of nutrition for the Grand Met unit.

"But the troubling part is that the FDA wants labels to quantify fat content not only on a per-serving basis but also on the basis of 100 grams of a product," he said. That means 3½ ounces of any product must also have less than 3 grams of fat to carry the low-fat designation.

General Mills also objects to the density requirement, said Alta Engstrom, director of nutrition.

"For Cheerios, a single 1-ounce serving, about a cup of cereal, is low-fat because it contains 2 grams fat. But 100 grams—3½ servings—doesn't meet the requirement of low fat. Therefore, a product like Cheerios would be forced out of this low-fat product category," she said. "We think this is inconsistent with current dietary guidelines, which overwhelmingly call for more grain intake, more intake of complex carbohydrates."

Nabisco Biscuit Co. is opposing serving-size proposals that would change a snack cracker single-serving size to a full from a half ounce. But Frito-Lay, a major snack marketer, endorses one 1-ounce serving size, already widely acknowledged as the industry standard for salty snacks.

"Nutrition claims and disclosure comparisons will be made between crackers with a one-half-ounce serving size and salty snacks with a 1-ounce serving size and that's going to look strange," said Robbi Dietrich, Frito-Lay director of government affairs. "We would like to see the concept of serving size replaced with the concept of reference nutrition units. At least all competing products should be given the same reference value."

Frito-Lay is also concerned about the proposed definition of "light." The company offers a Light product line, including Ruffles Light and Doritos Light, with a third less oil than regular versions. The proposed definition of "light" calls for a one-third reduction in calories, not fat, and the snack line wouldn't meet that definition.

If the proposal stands, Ms. Dietrich said, Frito-Lay's first option would be to rename the products.

It was a disagreement about the term "fresh" that prompted the FDA last year to seize from warehouses cases of Procter & Gamble Co.'s Citrus Hill Fresh Choice orange juice. The FDA said the product was misbranded since the juice was actually reconstituted.

The FDA now requires "made from concentrate" on juice labels; P&G already had that distinction on the juice label but dropped Fresh Choice from the product name.

"All competing products should be given the same reference value."

"Consumers should know what they're buying and be free to choose," said Robert Ilse, president of Stanislaus Food Products. "But you should know from the label when there's a quality difference, instead of discovering the difference when you get home and open the product."

P&G this week will recommend that the FDA eliminate the 100-gram rule and rely on serving size to determine the use of descriptors like low sodium, low cholesterol and low fat.

The company will also recommend the FDA add descriptors for unsaturated fat to parallel definitions on total fat. The proposed rules don't provide definitions for percent of unsaturated fat and for zero saturated fat, making it impossible to distinguish canola oils from other oils, for example.

Campbell Soup Co. believes the proposed changes for terms such as "healthy" and "nutritious" raise "serious constitutional concerns," said Martin Levitas, deputy general counsel and chief food and drug counsel.

He said restricting terms would confuse consumers by allowing "one company to use a term like 'healthy' in a brand name and preclude others, even though products prevented from using the term may have an equivalent or superior nutritional profile."

Michael Mudd, Kraft General Foods' VP-corporate communications, said the regulations "mandate a sea of fine print on the front of packages . . . Instead of drawing consumers to low-fat, low-sodium foods, all this clutter may drive them away."

Under the proposal, the company would have to change 15,000 different labels, he said.

Another aspect of the FDA overhaul that's drawing criticism is the time frame for implementation.

The FDA's estimate that conversion to the new regulations will cost $1.3 billion is too low, candy marketer M&M/Mars will argue.

M&M/Mars estimates it will spend $7 million on the changeover if given only six months, while a grace period of a year would mean just $1 million in costs since existing stocks could be depleted.

H.J. Heinz Co. wouldn't discuss its FDA comments, other than to confirm the company would meet the deadline. But it's believed Heinz, which markets Weight Watchers Foods, opposes the proposed rules on low-fat, low-sodium and serving-size designations.

Heinz relies mainly on portion control for the Weight Watchers line of low-fat frozen entrees, and presumably any serving size that would qualify for a low-fat designation would greatly exceed current portion sizes.

Food marketers are also concerned about differences between the rules and some of the proposed interim regulations. As of early this month, more than 100 comments had been recorded on the interim proposal. □ led Terrence Foutz, exec VP-group account director, to leave the agency abruptly on Feb. 17, after just 15 months on the job.

The reorganization plan, still being discussed, would split the Infiniti account into two groups reporting to a yet-to-be-hired account director. Although Hill Holliday offered Mr. Foutz the top position in one of the groups, he chose to leave rather than accept a diminished role, an agency source said.

Mr. Connors will head the account until a new account director is found.

The account will be divided into two groups to better focus on different aspects such as national and regional advertising, merchandising and brochures, sources say.

The reorganization plan hasn't been set, said Jack Sansolo, managing director of the Marina del Rey office.

Mr. Foutz left the agency as Hill Holliday prepares to bring in a new creative team on the Infiniti account. David Wecal and Dean Noble are leaving Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, New York, to join Hill Holliday as senior VP-creative directors in March. It's the second creative team shift since Infiniti introduced its first cars in late 1989.

Meanwhile, Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif., agency for the Nissan division, announced last week it will heighten the profile of Perkins/Butler, New York, its direct marketing subsidiary, by changing its name to Chiat/Day Direct Marketing. At the same time, it's recruiting top direct marketing executives to reopen an office in Los Angeles primarily to serve Nissan.

The direct shop closed its Los Angeles office about two years ago.

"It was a small office with just a few people," said Adelaide Horton, who remains general manager of the newly named agency. "It was a service office handling project work on Nissan. When the projects were over, we closed it up."

Earl J. Hesterberg, VP-general manager of the Nissan division, said any changes at Nissan's agency weren't dictated by the parent in Japan.

"I never experienced anyone from Nissan in Japan trying to influence us in one way or another," he said. "They generally believe that we are the local marketing experts."

But he added: "The Japanese domestic market has gone soft and there are cost pressures . . . We're all very cost-conscious now." □

Y&R to create promo giant

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Young & Rubicam will merge its sales promotion unit into its direct marketing operation, creating the world's largest non-advertising marketing services company.

A senior Y&R executive said the merger of the Wunderman Worldwide direct marketing operation and Cato Johnson Worldwide sales promotion unit could be announced as early as this week.

The merged company is expected to keep some form of the Wunderman Worldwide moniker and boast $1 billion in billings.

Both companies "are in the business of altering behavior in an immediate and accountable way," the Y&R executive said. "The technologies at the hearts of both those businesses are coming together, so it seems sensible to put them together."

He added that both sales promotion and direct marketing increasingly require database management capabilities to effectively target messages.

Murdoch: We'll do fine post-Diller

By Diane Mermigas and Joe Mandese

News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch moved quickly last week to assure the TV industry that Fox Inc. will thrive in the post-Diller era.

Barry Diller abruptly resigned last week as Fox chairman-ceo.

Mr. Murdoch said he would assume Mr. Diller's duties to assure the continued growth and profitability of Fox Inc., the parent company of Fox Broadcasting Co., 20th Century Fox Film Corp., 20th Television and Fox Television Stations.

"I've been overseeing it very closely over the last few months," he said.

"I guess I'll be making more direct decisions, although we've got a very strong team here," Mr. Murdoch said.

"And I'll have to spend more time on the movie side than I have in the past. That's always where the risk is," he said.

"Television is going very well. In fact, it's all going very well. I'm looking forward to it," Mr. Murdoch added.

Diller

Murdoch

Fox Inc.'s eight top executives under Mr. Diller are "absolutely in place and staying here," he said.

Last week's only major personnel change by press time was the promotion of Fox Inc. Exec VP Chase Carey, who adds the new title of chief operating officer in charge of daily administrative and financial matters.

"He'll be even more at my right hand than he was at Mr. Diller's," Mr. Murdoch said.

The timetables, policies and plans largely fashioned by Messrs. Murdoch and Diller will remain in place, Mr. Murdoch said.

■ Barry Diller talks about life after Fox—Page 32.

Fox Broadcasting executives said they will continue the network's aggressive expansion plans. Those plans include adding a sixth night of prime-time programming this summer and expanding to a full slate of seven nights during 1993. And plans to establish a full-fledged news division are under way

"We will go to seven nights a week as fast as we can develop the programming," Mr. Murdoch said.

Sources familiar with Fox Broadcasting's plans say the network is considering a late-night talk show targeted at young adults, and there's been speculation the network could try to lure funnyman David Letterman from NBC.

Mr. Letterman, the host of "Late Night With David Letterman," is said to be disenchanted with NBC management and has been rumored to be considering an offer to join ABC.

Mr. Murdoch, who's attended all Fox Broadcasting's program development meetings, said he doesn't think the network's new season series lineup will be adversely affected by Mr. Diller's departure.

Calif. lottery ousts Dailey & Associates

By Bradley Johnson

The California State Lottery, facing a 30% plunge in sales this fiscal year, last week terminated Dailey & Associates' contract and put its $25 million ad account up for review.

The move follows the October arrival of a new lottery director who's shaking up games, advertising and promotion to end the lottery's losing streak.

Dailey handled the account since 1987, and its contract was to run through February 1994. The lottery is exercising its option to break the contract for any reason with 30 days' notice.

Dailey received an unprecedented four-year contract renewal after lottery sales roared to a national record $2.6 billion for the fiscal year ended June 1989. That contract took effect in February 1990.

But lottery sales have fallen since then, reaching $2.13 billion in fiscal 1991. Based on performance so far this year, sales could plunge to as low as $1.4 billion to $1.5 billion.

A review has long been rumored (AA, Aug. 12). But Dailey Chairman Phillip Joanou said he was "stunned" because the new director, Sharon Sharp, recently told him Dailey was doing "a great job."

He said he hasn't decided whether to rebid the account, though an incumbent's chances of winning appear slim. Last month, Dailey won the $28 million Sizzler International restaurant account, which would keep agency billings around $200 million even after losing the lottery.

Dailey's creative isn't a "major factor" in the lottery's sales slump, said Joanne McNabb, the lottery's director of public affairs. Instead, she blamed the recession, delays in introducing new games and ad spending cuts.

In 1990, the lottery also made a marketing blunder by worsening the odds to drive up jackpots.

"They made the product worse and they cut the ad budget," Mr. Joanou said.

Spending, which is based on sales, has plunged from the $45 million spent last year. The new three-year contract that begins July 1 won't exceed $25 million annually, Ms. McNabb said. Most major agencies in California are expected to pursue the account.

By yearend, Ms. Sharp will have redesigned all lottery games, reviewed advertising and restructured promotion. The lottery last month hired Alcone Sims O'Brien, Irvine, for a consolidated three-year sales promotion account of up to $10 million a year (AA, Feb. 10). □

Isuzu ads try honesty

By Cleveland Horton and Alice Z. Cuneo

American Isuzu Motors will introduce the new Trooper sport utility vehicle March 15 with an "honesty" corporate campaign.

"If 'Joe Isuzu' was the campaign of liars, this is the campaign of honesty," said Richard Silverstein, principal and creative director of agency Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco.

The new Trooper, carrying the steepest sticker price of any Isuzu, will go up against such competitors as Ford Motor Co.'s Explorer and Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America's Montero.

The campaign, breaking later this month on prime-time network TV, is designed to relaunch the marque and the company, which spends about $95 million annually on advertising.

It's the first full-fledged Isuzu effort since Goodby succeeded Della Femina, McNamee, Los Angeles, on the account last year. Goodby and Isuzu executives both played down a whimsical TV spot from the agency that ran in January.

Silverstein

Mr. Silverstein said the campaign is based on what he called the "unwritten rules of driving."

One 60-second spot is titled "Men Will Never Stop & Ask for Directions." Other spots are a :30 titled "New York Off-road Vehicles" and a :60 and :30 called "Snow," about taking a child to see snow for the first time.

Four print executions show how the Trooper's technical specifications fit into one's life. For example, the unwritten law of "when there's a hill, there's a motor home in front of you" explains the benefits of a powerful engine. A separate print ad points out: "The smaller the person, the more space they occupy." It shows pictures of a youngster and all the belongings required for a trip.

Goodby sees Wieden & Kennedy's work for Subaru of America as the new campaign's primary competition, even though Subaru doesn't offer a sport utility vehicle.

Goodby and Portland, Ore.-based Wieden surprised industry observers when, as small independent shops, they won the creative portion of those two national car accounts (Goodby since has been acquired by Omnicom Group).

Wieden's Subaru ads drew attention for being decidedly noncarlike; the TV spots feature descriptive words in various typefaces scrolling over the scene as a voice-over speaks the words. □

Florida ad tax gets replay

By Steven W. Colford

A Florida legislative committee last week opened the door for the state to tax advertising the same way it did briefly in 1987. The House Finance & Taxation Committee voted 17-12 in favor of a bill from state Rep. Willie Logan (D., Opa-Locka) that would phase out exemptions for professional services including advertising from Florida's 6% sales tax. Advertising would become subject to taxation in 1994.

After ending exemptions in 1987, Florida suffered through six months of economic revolt before that measure was repealed.

Florida broadcasters and a business group last week teamed up on an anti-ad tax campaign that sparked local controversy. The National Federation of Independent Businesses effort relied on donated TV time, the Florida Association of Broadcasters said, and followed a paid TV, radio and print campaign from two teacher groups that blasted legislators for failing to adequately fund schools.

The Florida Education Association and Florida Teaching Professionals complained to the Federal Communications Commission that the broadcasters weren't playing fair by providing free time for an anti-tax message while requiring the teachers to pay for their time. An FCC official, without having seen the complaint, said the agency would have authority to act only if the anti-tax spot included a personal attack or a political editorial.

Taxing advertising "violates the First Amendment of the Constitution . . . is self-defeating and impacts negatively on the economy," Susan Gilbert, governor of the American Advertising Federation's Fourth District, told the committee last week. "The extension of the sales tax to advertising will send a message to the national business community that Florida has embarked on another radical change in tax policy, a policy that no other state employs and that will adversely impact the cost of doing business in this state."

The bill is likely to face a floor vote this month, said Bob Levy, president of Robert M. Levy & Associates, Miami, and an AAF lobbyist. He said a similar bill is expected in the Senate and that he doesn't expect Democratic Gov. Lawton Chiles to oppose the measure. The depth of support in the Legislature is hard to gauge, he said.

Dan Jaffe, exec VP of the Association of National Advertisers, said two factors make passage more difficult this time. "There's no sign of support from the leadership of the Legislature, and the state's economy is not nearly as vibrant as the last time," he said. "Do they want to put a burden on the selling process at a time like this?" □

Fox halftime ploy works

NEW YORK—Viewers tuned into Fox Broadcasting Co.'s "Doritos Zaptime/'In Living Color' Super Halftime Party" special and away from CBS' Super Bowl halftime coverage at nearly a corresponding rate, a special minute-by-minute analysis of Nielsen ratings shows.

CBS' halftime low rating was 16.7. While "Zaptime" never surpassed that, the special came within 2 points during the irreverent "Men on Football" segment, which got a 14.9 rating.

Overall, CBS' Super Bowl coverage averaged a 40.3 rating. The "In Living Color" special averaged a 12.1.

The analysis found about 70% of the "Zaptime" audience came from CBS. The rest came from other sources, including those watching programming on Fox stations.

"That's a very high percentage between two networks," said Charles Kennedy, director of program research at Fox.

Ratings during the Fox commercial breaks were significantly lower than during programming, something that's been found during other programming analyses.

"It was very traditional in the sense that during the commerical breaks, people leave to check out other stuff and then they come back again," Mr. Kennedy said.

During one Fox commercial break, ratings fell to 11.7 compared with a 14.9 rating for the programming leading into it. "That's an unusual drop," Mr. Kennedy said. □

WESTFIELD, N.J.—Fifteen radio networks saw their combined audience drop 0.5% last fall from spring 1991, according to Statistical Research Inc.'s Radar 44 fall 1991 results.

Radar publishes radio network audience estimates twice annually based on telephone surveys of 12,000 respondents who describe their radio listening over a seven-day period. The fall report reflects listening levels from November 1990 through October 1991.

Although some networks increased significantly and others declined during the period, the report was relatively "flat" compared with past reports, which have shown wide fluctuations among radio networks, said Bill McClenaghan, senior VP-research and development of the ABC Radio Network.

"This is a very flat book, but in this case flat is good, because it shows that network radio is growing much less volatile than it had been," Mr. McClenaghan said.

The biggest winners, on a percentage basis, were American Urban Radio Network (up 39.4%), Power (up 10.7%) and NBC (up 5.9%). □

COVER STORY

Tyson KO's competition to take Cover Story title

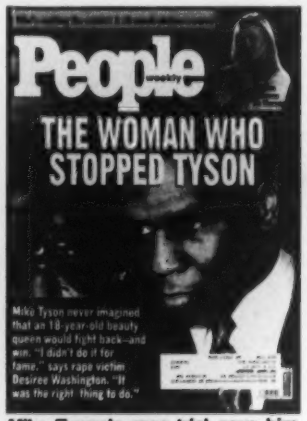
By Janice Kelly

Cover Story is a monthly ranking of celebrities' popularity as reflected by their appearances on the covers of more than 30 of the nation's leading publications.

Former world heavyweight boxing champion Mike Tyson went down for the count in court last month, but he emerged victorious in the Cover Story round.

The 25-year-old appeared on more magazine covers in February than any other person, due to coverage of his trial and subsequent conviction in an Indianapolis courtroom on charges he raped an 18-year-old beauty pageant contestant.

The guilty verdict, coming on the second anniversary of his loss of the heavyweight title to James "Buster" Douglas, earned Mr. Tyson 12 points on the Cover Story index, which assigns point values to cover appearances based on such factors as prominence of the photos and publications' frequency.



People
THE WOMAN WHO STOPPED TYSON
Mike Tyson never imagined that an 18-year-old beauty queen would fight back—and win. "I didn't do it for fame," says rape victim Desiree Washington. "It was the right thing to do."

Mike Tyson's rape trial gave him magazine cover prominence.

Mr. Tyson's accuser, Desiree Washington, finished in fifth place with 6 points. She shed her anonymity and appeared on the cover of People after the conviction, under the headline "The Woman Who Stopped Tyson."

While the month's main attraction was in the courtroom, the balance of cover editors' attention was focused on politics and Hollywood. Arkansas singer Gennifer Flowers took second place, tallying 10 points with her claim in the Star of a 12-year affair with Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton.

The Arkansas governor earned 6 Cover Story points last month, tying him for fifth with Ms. Washington.

Third place with 8.5 points went to actor Warren Beatty, star of the critically acclaimed film "Bugsy."

The former playboy and actress Annette Bening, proud parents of a baby girl, were named one of US' "romantic couples." Ms. Bening, who also stars in "Bugsy," earned 4 points last month, good for 10th place in the survey.

TV and radio talk show host Sally Jessy Raphael earned fourth place with 8 points following the death of her daughter weeks after her son was seriously injured in an automobile accident.

Tied for fifth place with Ms. Washington and Gov. Clinton was Cover Story veteran Elizabeth Taylor, amid continuing tabloid reports of a troubled marriage.

Eighth place also saw a tie, with 5.5 points, between the newest brat pack, the cast of Fox Broadcasting Co.'s hit TV series "Beverly Hills, 90210," and Barbra Streisand and Nick Nolte, stars of the hit film "Prince of Tides."

Also getting 4 points each in February were Oprah Winfrey, Hillary Clinton, Sean Young, Hammer, Kevin Costner and President Bush. □

Levin gets raves from Time execs

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Morale was on the rise at Time Warner's publishing unit last week following a series of meetings between new President and Co-CEO Gerald M. Levin and the editorial and business executives.

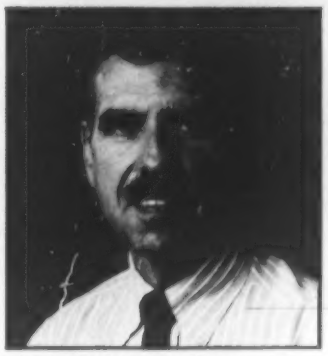
The outpouring of support for Mr. Levin underscored how neglected the division had felt since Time Inc.'s 1989 acquisition of Warner Communications and the extent to which morale and confidence had been shaken by layoffs, restructuring and sale rumors.

Publishers, managing editors and department heads who attended meetings with Mr. Levin—and who spoke only on the condition of anonymity—said he spoke passionately about restoring the magazines' journalistic heritage and vowed the division would never be sold.

"What came through loud and clear was his appreciation of the fact that a real morale problem had developed in the Time & Life Building over the last year or so and that it needed to be addressed," a top editor said.

Mr. Levin, 52, rose to power late last month after the abrupt departure of N.J. Nicholas Jr., whose vision for Time Warner clashed with that of Chairman and Co-CEO Steven J. Ross. Mr. Levin met with managing editors the morning after his promotion and met separately last week with publishers, department heads, top Time editors and book publishing executives.

Each meeting was held at the Time & Life Building, the magazine group's "turf," not Time Warner corporate headquarters. And Mr. Levin quickly endorsed a recommendation to change the name of Time Warner Publishing Co., made up of the magazine and book divisions, back to Time Inc. Magazine group executives likened it to movie studio Warner Bros.' retention of its name after the merger.



Gerald M. Levin's effect on Time Warner's publishing unit has already been felt.

"This has been a tremendous shot in the arm for publishing, for magazines, for books and for me personally," said Reginald K. Brack Jr., chairman of Time Warner Publishing and chairman, president and ceo of Time Inc. Magazine Co. "We've always had good support from the parent company. Now we have enthusiastic support."

Mr. Brack said Mr. Levin has already given the magazine group the green light to pursue "seven or eight" expansion projects, including a Japanese-language edition of Time and ongoing strategic alliance talks with American Express Co., which Mr. Brack acknowledged for the first time.

The talks would likely involve creating a joint venture to publish AmEx magazines, including Travel & Leisure and Food & Wine, and give Time Warner titles access to AmEx's database.

"We're still in discussions with American Express. It's a very complex subject, so it takes a lot of time," Mr. Brack said. A decision on the deal could be made in about a month, he said.

The magazine group is also considering starting or buying businesses in database management, event marketing and in-store promotion areas to offer advertisers a wider range of options, he said.

Mr. Brack said his working relationship with Mr. Levin is strong, but there were rumblings last week about the differences in their management styles.

While Mr. Levin is said to be a creative risk taker, along the lines of Mr. Ross, Mr. Brack's style is considered closer to that of the conservative Mr. Nicholas. Magazine group executives say the difference was painfully evident at meetings last week at which both men spoke.

At the meetings, Mr. Levin "talked about his support for the magazines and said they would not, categorically not, ever be sold off," said an editorial executive. "I think it was a good step in the right direction."

Mr. Levin said creativity was more important than costs and that layoffs were "a thing of the past," but also stressed that he "will be a bear on quarterly earnings," Mr. Brack said. □ were often negotiated and managed by Busch Media).

A-B

"We are unique. So much of what we do is sponsorships," said Tony Ponturo, who's both VP-corporate media at A-B and president of Busch Media Group. "This way our planning people can be working directly with the brand teams."

Mr. Ponturo said A-B hopes to save money by taking the buying and planning in-house, but he also thinks such projects as local event and sports sponsorships and national rock concert sponsorships must be fully integrated with advertising.

"Rather than just being advertising personnel, our media planners will be [integrated] planning personnel," Mr. Ponturo said. "We want to make sure those [planners] working are working on the basis of the needs of the individual brands."

Anheuser-Bush thinks it "can do it cheaper."

Busch Media already handled $140 million of A-B's beer spending, Mr. Ponturo said. With the addition of the remaining media buying and all planning, Busch Media becomes the largest in-house media buyer and planner in the country, agency sources say.

Busch Media also buys for Eagle Snacks and does some buying for Busch Entertainment, though their agency-based media planning assignments will be unaffected.

Advertising and media buying executives say A-B's move may foretell agencies' future as clients more closely scrutinize the traditional bundling of creative and media.

In recent weeks, the link between creative and media buying and planning has been broken by American Express Co., DHL Corp. and Nestle's Hills Bros. unit, among others.

By breaking the link, marketers may find it's easier to move creative without having to rejuggle the media portion of the account. Ralston Purina Co. and Thomas J. Lipton Co. already do much of their media planning in-house, and industry observers believe other companies will follow. Procter & Gamble Co. and Kraft General Foods both maintain large corporate media planning staffs who work with their agency media planners.

"In the 1960s and 1970s, marketing planning was done by agencies because marketers were a lot lazier," said Roger Casty, exec VP of CPM, a Chicago media buying company. "Now that responsibility has been taken on by advertisers. With so much direct contact between media and marketers because of cable and sports, that's where it's going."

Still, Mr. Casty warned that media planning isn't for everyone.

"They have to be more familiar with new things like buying local cable," he said. "I can't believe most advertisers can keep on top of it. If they are going to do what we do, they would have to have a whole staff of people to listen to new pitches. A-B is mainly buying sports, so it may be able to do it . . ."

Traditional agencies may be fueling some of their own problems, said Ken Slater, president of Hawk Media, San Francisco.

"In the last year, a lot of the large full-service agencies have begun to unbundle themselves, because they're pitching media-only assignments," he said. "They're almost causing it to happen themselves. They're saying that media can be separated from the creative. They're weakening the argument for full service."

He also said the unbundling may make it simple for clients to change agencies.

"What happens when these assignments get unbundled is that without all the other infrastructure involved, the client is simply looking at the agency's creative," he said. "The it's a matter of whether the client is happy with the agency's creative or not. It's so much easier to move it . . ."

Mr. Ponturo, who said A-B will offer jobs to some of the agencies' media buyers and planners, said price was a factor in the move.

"There was no dissatisfaction with the work done," he said. "We think we can do it cheaper."

Mr. Ponturo said he believes A-B's size will help it evaluate media without missing rising opportunities. □

Nets get less for more

More commercials sold, but revenues fall over 10%

By Joe Mandese

The Big 3 networks' prime-time revenues fell more than 10% in 1991 despite an increase in the number of commercials sold, according to an Advertising Age analysis of data from Arbitron Co.'s MediaWatch.

The Big 3 had revenues of $5.43 billion. They increased the number of prime-time spots 0.5% to 62,254 in 1991, but the average cost per spot fell 10.7% to $87,235.

CBS was the only network of the Big 3 to reduce the number of prime-time spots, down 1.7% to 21,196.

CBS' average cost per spot increased 3.8% to $76,035. A spot on CBS was the cheapest of the Big 3, even though ABC and NBC experienced drops in their average cost per spot.

NBC continued to be the most expensive prime-time network, but its average unit cost fell the most, down 19.9% to $94,802.

Despite increasing the number of prime-time commercials 2.6% to 20,709, the lower cost per unit reduced NBC's prime-time revenues by 17.9% to $1.96 billion in 1991.

The cost of a prime-time commercial on ABC fell 5.9% to $94,212. And while the network increased the number of prime-time commercials sold in 1991 by 0.9% to 20,349, ABC's prime-time revenues dropped 5.1% to $1.92 billion.

While program scheduling shifts make year-to-year comparisons difficult for other network dayparts, the overall cost of a Big 3 network commercial fell 5.4% in 1991 to $28,781.

The decline was precipitated by severe network TV budget cuts by several key advertisers, particularly domestic car, package goods and fast-food marketers.

No. 1 network TV advertiser General Motors Corp. cut its budget 12% to $527.8 million in 1991. No. 9 Chrysler Corp.'s spending fell 7% to $176.2 million, though No. 6 Ford Motor Co.'s budget increased 10% to $217.5 million.

Spending by No. 2 network advertiser Procter & Gamble Co. dropped 8% to $515.6 million, while spending for No. 3 Philip Morris USA, including Kraft General Foods, fell 3% to $390.2 million.

No. 13 McDonald's Corp. slashed its network budget 26% to $171.8 million, and No. 21 Grand Metropolitan, which includes Burger King Corp., cut its budget 44% to $103.3 million.

No. 12 AT&T Co., another huge network advertiser, fell 30% to $172 million. □

More Saatchi red ink

Stumbling in Japan, but '92 looks better

By David Kilburn and Laurel Wentz

Saatchi & Saatchi Co. on March 10 is expected to announce that 1991 was another year of losses, at the same time its march to global coverage is stumbling in Japan.

Saatchi will report pretax losses of about $15 million for last year, analysts estimate, compared with 1990 pretax losses of $41.6 million.

However, the reported 1991 losses could appear much higher due to new accounting rules regarding exceptional items. Depending on how the new rules are interpreted, one analyst estimates Saatchi could show a loss of as much as $100 million.

It's believed that Saatchi is trying to cram all possible write-offs into 1991 to clear the way for a return to profit in 1992.

For 1992, analysts are looking at pretax profits of about $30 million for Saatchi.

"They want all the bad news to be in last year's [results]," said one source familiar with Saatchi. "This [year] is [Chief Executive] Robert Louis-Dreyfus' last chance."

Citing an example of costs still out of control, he said the Saatchi holding company is still eating up about $36 million a year, about one-quarter of which is property costs and the rest largely salaries.

"They've still got too many overheads," said an analyst at a London stockbroker. "It applies in the advertising networks and also in the center [parent company]. You've got the Saatchi brothers, then Louis-Dreyfus,

Marketers drop 'recycled'

By Jennifer Lawrence

Green marketers are turning yellow.

In the absence of national guidelines, many consumer product marketers are dropping the terms "recycled" and "recyclable" from labeling, even though packaging is still made from recycled material or can be recycled.

This new restraint follows a fever pitch of green merchandising that began two years ago and has received much consumer attention.

Now, Procter & Gamble Co., Kraft General Foods, First Brands Corp., Mary Kay Cosmetics, Andrew Jergens Co. and others say they're backing away from green claims because states' legislation provides widely different definitions of the terms "recycled" and "recyclable."

Companies continue to develop packaging and products that are better for the environment, but many are unwilling to make such claims for fear of violating existing state laws. Just as threatening, they say, is the prospect of yet another state creating new green standards—which could put labels now thought to be legal at risk.

Instead, marketers are revising, dropping or avoiding certain green claims altogether until the Federal Trade Commission or Congress establish national standards.

P&G is in the process of removing from all labels the term "re-

Jaguar in hunt for agency

By Jon Lafayette and Ray Serafin

Jaguar Cars last week put its $15 million to $20 million account up for review just as incumbent agency Geer, DuBois welcomed a new president, former J. Walter Thompson USA President Stephen G. Bowen Jr.

Jaguar had been expected to make changes since being acquired by Ford Motor Co. in 1989 for $2.5 billion.

Ford hoped improvements to Jaguar quality and efficiency would enable it to capitalize on the legendary brand image. But the turnaround has been difficult, as Ford found the British automaker's plants less efficient than expected and future product plans in disarray.

Jaguar lost $596.5 million in 1990 and another $354 million in 1991. U.S. sales dropped by nearly 50%, to 9,376 cars in 1991, though it posted a nearly 18% gain in the first two months of 1992.

Jaguar issued a terse statement saying it's been re-examining all operations with the goal of developing "a greater degree of integrated strategic planning between the company and its external partners."

Hinting at the need for international capabilities lacking at Geer, the statement said Jaguar would evaluate agencies "on the basis of [their] understanding of the challenges of managing a brand image on a global scale."

New York-based Geer will pro-

Honestly Fresh can be "fresh" because it's not heat-pasteurized.

A little squirt puts 'fresh' back in OJ

By Judann Dagnoli

A tiny Florida orange juice marketer has found a way to fight the giants with a fresh idea.

Vero Beach Groves produces a juice that it labels fresh, yet has a long shelf life. The product, called Honestly Fresh Squeezed, is only sold in supermarkets in Boston and Madison, Wis., where it's going up against the biggies.

The marketer claims the orange juice can carry the "fresh" label, unlike major marketers' brands, because Honestly Fresh Squeezed isn't heat-pasteurized.

Most fresh-squeezed juices last only three to five days, but Honestly Fresh Squeezed uses a combination of manufacturing and packaging technology to remain fresh for a month, said Judd Brotman, VP-sales and marketing at Vero Beach Groves.

The Food & Drug Administration last year halted dozens of food marketers from calling their heat-processed products fresh, including Procter & Gamble Co.'s Citrus Hill Fresh Choice orange juice. But because heat pasteurization isn't used in Honestly Fresh Squeezed, it seems to meet

AmEx keeps O&M in Latin America

MIAMI—Ogilvy & Mather kept American Express Co.'s $10 million account for a Latin American TV campaign, fending off an aggressive challenge by Young & Rubicam's Wunderman Worldwide unit. Jim Hartenstein, AmEx divisional VP-sales and marketing, said O&M won because of extensive consumer research for its new pan-regional image campaign concept. The new campaign, which replaces separate efforts for AmEx's green card in each of six to eight Latin American countries, will start late next month. Wunderman, which earlier this year won a major AmEx assignment in Europe, keeps the Corporate Card account in Latin America and elsewhere.

Taco Bell kills 39¢ snack line

IRVINE, Calif.—Taco Bell has quietly dropped its 39¢ Fiesta Menu, a line of snacks introduced a year ago. The move suggests fast-food discounting has bottomed out, good news for McDonald's and others that have struggled to match the aggressive pricing of PepsiCo-owned Taco Bell. Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, handles Taco Bell.

Eyewear sales slow

Optical retailers adjust tactics due to recession

By Christy Fisher

The recession has cast a harsh glare on the optical industry, with many major eyewear retailers scrambling just to stay alive in the 1990s.

After a decade of out-of-sight growth, sales and new store growth have slowed—thus dispensing with the myth that eyeglass retailing is recession-proof.

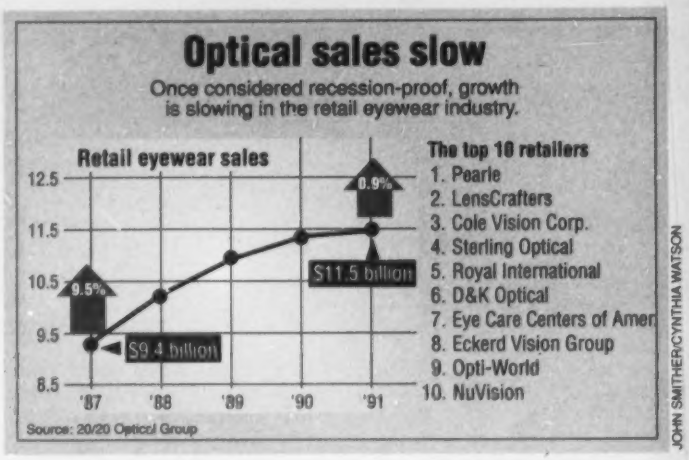
The retail eyewear industry had about $11.5 billion in sales last year, up less than 1% from 1990. Sales were off sharply from the 10%-to-15% annual growth recorded through much of the 1980s, said Marge Axelrad, editorial director of 20/20 Optical Group, which owns trade publications Vision Monday and 20/20.

The recession, coupled with a saturated market, has hurt much of the industry, made up primarily of mom-and-pop retailers.

Grand Metropolitan's Pearle, the No. 1 player, reported a 20.4% drop in sales to $475 million for fiscal year ending Sept. 30, 1991. Also, No. 4 Sterling Optical, a 170-unit chain, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December.

Pearle recently hired Ron Nykiel as its new senior VP-brand strategy and chief marketing officer. Mr. Nykiel has called an agency review for the creative portion of its $45 million account; it will include incumbent Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago.

Sterling has significantly cut its ad budget and is doing mostly newspaper advertising in-house, instead of using Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. Sterling spent $3 million in 1990 and $419,200 in the first nine months of 1991, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.



JOHN SMITHER/CYNTHIA WATSON

"The optical industry is in a very serious downturn," said Steve Braasch, senior VP-account director for GSD&M, Austin, Texas, which in December resigned the $2.3 million Texas State Optical account. Glasses "can be a deferred purchase when times get tough. Emergency [replacement] situations are only a small part of the market. Also, the marketplace is overstored . . . There's going to be a shakeout."

Growth in the 1980s was fueled by the building of new stores, the development of new retail concepts such as superstores and 1-hour service centers, and the popularity of designer eyewear, said Ms. Axelrad of 20/20 Optical Group. Growth in the 1990s will come from stealing market share from competitors, she predicted.

One major up-and-coming format appears to be everyday low pricing, industry observers say. Frame 'N Lens, which now has 120 stores, has come on strong over the past couple of years. Davis, Ball & Colombatto, Los Angeles, handles.

No. 2 LensCrafters is also testing a new format called Sight & Save.

Wal-Mart Stores, the nation's top retailer, is testing in-store optical departments—striking fear in the hearts of many optical retailers. It's a move also being tested by LensCrafters, which last month announced it will expand its test of Sight & Save with three in-store locations leased from Kmart Corp.

Everyday low pricing could affect optical retailing the same way it has hit department store and other retailing—splitting the market at the high-end specialty stores and low-end discount stores.

Everyday low pricing could also turn on its head optical advertising, which now consists primarily of two-for-one offers and heavy discounts.

"In my opinion, all of the chains would do better by positioning themselves long-term with brand image, rather than trying to undercut each other with price," said Beth Cevasco, a marketing analyst with Sterling Optical.

NuVision, a chain of 114 stores, has done two-for-one eyeglasses promotions in the past and may do so again, said President Jonathan Raven, who called such promotions attention getters, especially in tough economic times.

"But you have to do a great job on the basics. Two of something is only good if one of something is also good," he said.

NuVision's $5 million ad account is handled by Simons Michelson Zieve, Troy, Mich.

Though optical retailers are struggling with the recession and oversaturation of the market, they see a bright future—due to aging baby boomers. ☐

Conde Nast rethinks sales approach

NEW YORK—Conde Nast Publications is on the verge of unveiling a revamped corporate ad sales approach that will let advertisers choose the titles they want to package. The publisher is expected to add its two newest titles, Allure and Details, to the network. Conde Nast's longstanding policy against rate negotiation won't change, said executives familiar with the new plan. Company executives wouldn't comment.

Pfizer plans to sell Coty cosmetics unit

By Pat Sloan

BOCA RATON, Fla.—Pfizer, one of the last pharmaceutical marketers to own a leading, mass-market cosmetics and fragrance company, appears ready to exit the beauty business by selling its Coty division.

At last week's annual Cosmetic, Toiletry & Fragrance Association meeting here, industry executives said Pfizer is in serious negotiations with Benckiser Consumer Products, the U.S. arm of Benckiser Deutschland.

Last year, Benckiser acquired Quintessence, marketer of Jovan fragrances.

"They are down to the nitty-gritty," said one executive familiar with the negotiations. "Benckiser's first offer of $400 million [for Coty] was rejected. They came back with $450 million, were rejected again and now are seriously negotiating in the neighborhood of $475 million."

A letter of intent is expected to be signed by the end of the month if final negotiations proceed according to plan.

Coty's annual sales exceed $250 million and much of the company's strength is in the mass-market fragrance business, where it owns top fragrances like Exclamation and Stetson.

Coty spends about $31 million a year in advertising. Its main agency is Ketchum Advertising, New York. Tay-

BBDO trims exec ranks on West Coast

By Cleveland Horton

The ax cut swiftly through the executive suite at BBDO Worldwide's Los Angeles office last week, slashing the president-ceo, four senior VPs, one VP and a creative team from the ranks.

Topping the list of executives asked to step down is Gene F. Cameron, president-ceo, who butted heads with BBDO North America Chairman Tom Clark's view of the agency's future in the West.

Mr. Clark said the cuts are an effort to "refocus" the agency's West Coast operations away from chasing new business and offering "integrated marketing services," and toward basic advertising.

"We know how to build brands, primarily by building pretty good advertising that's

Feds set fund to ax outdoor boards

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—Federal officials, armed with a $428 million compensation fund, say the end has come for tens of thousands of outdoor boards that don't comply with the 1965 Highway Beautification Act.

Under a timetable announced earlier this month, states will have two years to remove an estimated 114,000 outdoor boards along interstates and major highways that don't comply with the law—or face the loss of a portion of their federal highway funds.

The federal government said it will pay as much as $428 million to the owners of an estimated 92,000 signs that weren't illegal when they were erected; state governments must pay an undisclosed additional amount. Another 22,000 signs considered illegal when they were built will be taken down without compensation.

The targeted boards are in violation of spacing, zoning and other regulations.

The sign removal program had been dormant since 1983, when funds to compensate sign owners dried up. Under new legislation signed into law last December,

Hungry magazines get taste of relief

Ad pages up 1% after 17-month drop

By Scott Donaton

Magazine publishers are getting their first glimpse of recovery from a devastating two-year-plus ad slump.

The 160 magazines tracked by Publishers Information Bureau saw their first ad page increase in 17 months, with pages up 0.9% in February from the same month last year.

Publishers are reluctant to predict a turnaround, having watched predictions prove untrue the past two years. They say one month of growth doesn't constitute a trend, and the first quarter overall remains weak.

But there's growing optimism, a sense that the downturn has hit bottom and a slow build could begin by the second half, if not the second quarter.

"No one wants to beat the band on this yet because we've all gotten burned, but I would say there are some pretty good signs," said S. Christopher Meigher, president of Time Inc. Magazine Co.'s New York division. "Business is definitely getting better. A second-half rebound still looks good."

"We're seeing some positive bits here and there in different categories," said Ed Kosner, president of New York Magazine, which saw an uptick in pages. "It's like recovery from substance abuse. You take it one issue at a time."

2 big deals leave entertainment king Pepsi flat

By Marcy Magiera and Alison Fahey

Coca-Cola tied up a partnership deal with one of the biggest movies of 1992: 20th Century Fox's "Home Alone 2: Lost in New York."

Coca-Cola Co.'s aggressive courtship of Hollywood is paying off, leaving rival Pepsi-Cola Co. without a date for the movies this summer or holiday season.

Coca-Cola has outbid Pepsi for promotional partnerships with what are expected to be the hottest movies of 1992: Warner Bros.' "Batman Returns" and 20th Century Fox Film Corp.'s "Home Alone 2: Lost in New York."

The deals leave Pepsi without a major movie tie-in this summer, the key soft-drink selling season, and, so far, during the holidays. They also give Coca-Cola a chance to make significant inroads in the youth market while landing a blow to Pepsi's dominance in entertainment marketing.

Hollywood insiders maintain that Coca-Cola's success may have as much to do with attitude as with money.

Coca-Cola is known in Hollywood as an accommodating tie-in partner, allowing its brands to act in a supporting role to the movies. Conversely, Pepsi has a reputation for insisting on starring roles.

"Coke is more part of your life, while Pepsi wants you to be a part of their life," said a Hollywood promotion executive who requested anonymity.

Hollywood and Pepsi executives said the soft-drink marketer tried to tie in with "Batman Returns," set for release June 19, but was outbid by the combination of Coca-Cola and McDonald's Corp. (see related story on Page 6). However, Pepsi officials said it never seriously pursued such an alliance.

Coca-Cola then began courting "Home Alone" star Macauley Culkin and is said to be close to signing the young actor as a celebrity endorser for Sprite.

Creative Artists Agency acted as Coca-Cola's eyes and ears in Hollywood, alerting the soft-drink company when it heard, through client John Hughes, that talks had broken down between Pepsi and Macauley. Mr. Hughes is the producer and screenwriter of both "Home Alone" films.

Coca-Cola declined to comment, but executives familiar with the plan say a deal is close to completion that would include two Sprite commercials featuring Macauley, a Sprite placement in "Home Alone 2" and mention of the movie in a Sprite ad.

Lowe & Partners, New York, handles Sprite, and the spots featuring Macauley are expected to include the brand's current "I like the Sprite in you" theme.

Pepsi had a product placement for its flagship Pepsi brand in the 1990 sleeper hit "Home Alone" and invested $15 million in a promotion tied to the movie's videocassette release last fall. The marketer had an option to use Macauley in a commercial for an additional $500,000.

Hollywood insiders say Pepsi was also trying to lock up promotional rights to the release of "Home Alone 2" in theaters this holiday season and in post-release ancillary markets, but Macauley's management blocked the deal.

Though Coca-Cola is expected to pay Macauley $2 million for his endorsement, Pepsi denied the archrivals engaged in a bidding war.

"Frankly, we weren't willing to pay the amount they were asking and we passed," said Andrew Giangola, Pepsi public relations manager. Still, he added that the company was pleased with its tie-in with the original "Home Alone" video release.

Mr. Giangola acknowledged that, to date, Pepsi has no major movie tie-in for any of its brands this summer. However, company executives said Pepsi is still looking for a holiday film promotion.

Coca-Cola has been attacking its rival's dominance in entertainment marketing in recent months.

First, the company last September signed Creative Artists Agency as its "worldwide media and communications consultant." And last month, it approved production of a new movie-theme commercial that was the brainchild of Hollywood producer Ray Stark.

At the same time, Pepsi has been trying not to focus as much on one celebrity in its advertising, said Tom Pirko, president of Bevmark, an industry consultancy.

"Their appetite for the one big name is diminishing," he said.

As an example, he cited Pepsi's recent "Gotta have it" campaign for flagship Pepsi, which features several celebrities. The Diet Pepsi campaign featuring singer Ray Charles is an exception because it took on a life of its own, Mr. Pirko said.

That effort contains the popular "You got the right one baby, uh huh" slogan. BBDO Worldwide is Pepsi-Cola's agency. □

Volvo fine-tuning infomercial

By Cleveland Horton and Raymond Serafin

Volvo Cars of North America's 30-minute infomercial on safety is back on the air, with tune-in print ads carrying code numbers to assist people in videotaping the paid programming.

The car company becomes the first advertiser to avail itself of the VCR Plus code, marketed by a new division of Gemstar Group of Cos. called iPlus.

Newspaper ads in Los Angeles over the weekend listed the times and stations of the infomercial as well as codes for each airing.

Volvo's safety-oriented infomercial ran in a six-week test last fall in San Diego and attracted 9,000 calls to an 800 number, said Robert Austin, director of communications for the car company.

Volvo sent callers copies of an Insurance Institute for Highway Safety report on death rates for model 1984-88 cars and Volvo product brochures. Volvo dealers also followed up with phone calls.

Mr. Austin said the infomercial increased awareness of Volvo and its safety positioning, but he said Volvo officials weren't satisfied with the results of follow-up calls.

So for the four-week Los Angeles run that began March 9, Volvo hired a telemarketing consultant, Robbie Bray of the Ultimate Image, to develop strategies for salesmen trying to arrange test drives for those who call in response to the infomercial.

Volvo also plans to invite those responding to the Los Angeles airings to a daylong "safe driving" school, expected to be scheduled in April. Volvo products will be used, but the school won't be held at dealerships.

Mr. Austin confirmed Volvo is using the VCR Plus numbers in its print ads. The VCR Plus service was made available to Volvo at no cost, in return for some survey work by Volvo's 800-number operators, who will ask callers if they use VCR Plus.

The Los Angeles program is expected to become a blueprint for using the infomercial on a market-by-market basis in the future, Mr. Austin said. □

FEBRUARY AD RESULTS

Ads up

12,864 ad pages in February, up 0.9%. For the first two months of 1992, they carried 22,290 pages, a decline of 1.5% from the same period in 1991.

Ad revenues—not considered a valid indicator of magazines' health since they don't reflect discounts—rose 4.9% to $528.2 million in February and 1.5% to $896.2 million after two months.

Seventy-eight of the 160 PIB-tracked titles registered ad page gains in February, the highest figure in more than two years, said Jim Guthrie, exec VP-marketing development for Magazine Publishers of America.

"One month does not a trend make, but [recovery] may be starting to happen," he said.

The February performance was driven primarily by solid gains from a handful of ad categories, particularly business and consumer services, computers and office equipment, and drugs.

One category that continues to fall is cigarettes and tobacco, which dropped from the top 10 ad categories in January (AA, Feb. 24). The category's ad pages fell 45% to 384.5 through February.

Automotive is showing signs of strength. The No. 1 category accounted for 1,358 ad pages in February, a 13% increase. Auto ad pages were down 1.2% through February to 2,494 pages.

"Auto is doing OK for an industry that was really hurting quite badly," said Kent Brownridge, senior VP-general manager at Straight Arrow Publishers, parent of Rolling Stone and US.

Mr. Brownridge dismissed the February page increase, saying Straight Arrow and many others have had a "terrible" first quarter, and a strong second quarter would be the only recovery sign.

"We're seeing a much better second quarter than the first, and one that exceeds last year's second quarter," he said. "There are some indications the economy might be slowly rising out of the doldrums, and I think that will have an effect on advertising."

Publishers caution that the climb back will be slow, and recovery won't mean a return to the robust days of the mid-1980s. Ad pages fell 3.7% for the industry in 1990 and another 8.7% last year. They could remain essentially flat for another two years, publishers say.

"I wouldn't say we see a tidal wave coming—maybe a little ripple," said John B. Brunelle, exec VP at Conde Nast Publications.

Because magazines have cut costs with layoffs and other measures, "the benefits of even a mild surge can have a significant impact" on profits, Mr. Kosner said.

In addition to continued strong performances from special-interest magazines like Outside, Longevity and Sassy, a number of mass-market titles, harder hit by the recession, are displaying signs of strength. Business Week, The Economist, Family Circle, Forbes, Fortune, The New Yorker, Newsweek and TV Guide were all up in ad pages through February. □

Chrysler may switch off prime time ads

By Raymond Serafin

Chrysler Corp. may drop out of prime-time network TV advertising as part of a sweeping reorganization of its media strategy.

"We are seriously questioning whether we want to continue advertising on prime time," John Damoose, Chrysler's VP-marketing, said in a speech last week at the International Events Group's annual sponsorship marketing conference in Chicago. "We're questioning whether those dollars aren't being frittered away."

In a follow-up interview, Mr. Damoose said Chrysler is moving money into more targeted media in response to both the growth of alternative media and the fragmentation of the automotive market.

Money moved out of prime time would likely end up in network sports and news, print media, promotional programs and so-called niche media, Mr. Damoose said.

He criticized the networks for "the incredible clutter" in prime-time programming, an issue that worries other marketers and agencies. Mr. Damoose also blasted recent network programming trends.

"It's apparent that with the decline in ratings, the networks have chosen to increase the content of sex and violence, which we absolutely will not support,"

McDonald's adds publishing to menu

Fall 'McMagazine' test to target mothers, kids

By Scott Donaton

McDonald's wants to be a McPublisher.

The fast-food chain is developing a family-activity magazine that will be distributed in McDonald's Corp. restauraunts and targeted to mothers and their children, say industry executives familiar with the plans.

Titled McMagazine, the publication will carry outside advertising from non-competing marketers.

Plans call for two issues to be published in the fall and distributed to undetermined test markets. If successful, the magazine will be rolled out nationally next year with a higher frequency.

Full distribution in McDonald's highly trafficked 8,600 U.S. stores could give McMagazine "significant circulation," said one executive.

McMagazine will be published as a joint venture with Quad Publishing Group, the Milwaukee-based publishing arm of magazine printer Quad/Graphics.

The unit publishes Milwaukee Magazine and is run by President-Publisher Betty Quadracci, wife of Quad/Graphics President-CEO Harry Quadracci. She will also serve as publisher of McMagazine.

Ms. Quadracci declined to comment; McDonald's executives couldn't be reached.

McMagazine will probably be published as a quarterly in 1993 and, if successful, would continue to increase frequency with the goal of publishing monthly.

The title will be distributed free.

The launch of McMagazine fits with two current trends in the magazine industry.

A growing number of marketers are launching their own maga-

Linda McCartney, wife of ex-Beatle Paul, has her name on an entree line.

Are you ready for food by Linda McCartney?

By Judann Dagnoli and Laurel Wentz

A U.K. food company owned by United Biscuit is looking for a little help from its friends to market Linda McCartney frozen vegetarian entrees in the U.S.

The line, already selling in the U.K., includes items like meatless Lasagne, Beefless Burgers, Golden Nuggets, Spaghetti Bolognese Style, Deep Country Pies, Vegetable Wedges and Cauliflower & Broccoli & Potato Gratin.

Two other items that could face a difficult translation to the U.S. market are Ploughman Pasties and Ploughman Pie.

U.S. retail food executives said last week a London consultancy representing Ross Young's Ltd. has approached U.S. frozen food companies seeking to license the year-old line, which carries the name and likeness of Ms. McCartney, wife of pop star and ex-Beatle Paul McCartney.

One company believed to have rebuffed the offer is Campbell Soup Co., a major player in frozen foods through its Swanson and LeMenu products. Campbell executives declined to comment.

Senate probes ad subsidies to marketers

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Senate's Agriculture Committee is scheduled to open an investigation tomorrow into a program that provides a dozen major marketers $1 million to $10 million in federal funds to help advertise and promote their products abroad.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture marketing subsidy is earmarked for $1 billion in federal funds through 1995.

Among the marketers receiving funds last year are E&J Gallo Winery, Pillsbury Co. and Tyson Foods. Altogether, 633 marketers got $200 million from U.S. commodity groups that received funds from the Agriculture program.

Several lawmakers are asking that the subsidy, called the Market Promotion Program, be eliminated or overhauled.

Rep. Dick Armey (R., Texas) has the support of at least 30 colleagues to try to kill the subsidy, which began in the mid-1980s as the Targeted Export Assistance Program.

Clinton team won't hang 'help wanted' signs

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—If Bill Clinton's top advertising consultant has his way, there will be few, if any, Madison Avenue types on the ad team of the likely Democratic presidential nominee.

All the Arkansas governor's primary election ads have been produced by Great American Media, a unit of the Washington consultancy Greer, Margolis, Mitchell, Grunwald & Associates, and that's not likely to change much, said media adviser Frank Greer. The makeup of Gov. Clinton's team for the general election took on greater significance last week, when Paul Tsongas suspended his presidential bid, citing severe campaign debt.

Unlike the Bush team, which continues to court Charlotte Beers, former ceo of Tatham/RSCG, Chicago, and other Madison Avenue types, Mr. Greer said he's not a fan of adding staff from the ranks of commercial advertising.

POLITICS ★★★★ 92

"That's never worked terribly well for a Democrat in the past, has it?" he said. "We have a 55-person agency and could pretty much handle everything ourselves. That's not to say we wouldn't accept any creative suggestions from someone on the outside, but I'm not so sure about bringing in outside people."

The mixing of political and commercial ad consultants in the 1988 Democratic campaign of Michael Dukakis proved disastrous.

"Greer is partly right—it was tremendously unsuccessful in '88," said Ken Swope, whose Boston political consultancy, Ken Swope & Associates, produced some Dukakis spots.

"But that was more because the campaign went to the wrong commercial ad people. I think they should bring in people from commercial advertising, but they must be careful that the people they bring in can put themselves in a creative political mode," said Mr. Swope, whose consultancy produced ads for Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin's presidential race.

"Frank Greer is afraid of what happened to me . . . in 1988," when commercial advertising consultants took over the campaign's media from the political consultants who handled advertising through the primary elections, he said.

Clinton

But Mr. Swope said the right people can add mightily to campaign advertising.

"The great creative people in commercial advertising make the great creatives in political advertising look like plumbers," said Mr. Swope, who began his advertising career at N W Ayer. "Political consultants, to a large degree, don't have a clue about how to move people emotionally with ads." □

High TV costs cited as Tsongas ends bid

By Steven W. Colford

In the end, Paul Tsongas said, it was the cost of TV advertising that forced him to end his presidential bid. Facing two weeks of campaigning in Connecticut and New York and already deep in debt, Sen. Tsongas on March 19 abruptly killed his bid for the Democratic nomination.

"We did not have the resources necessary to fight the media war in New York," he said. "I would have been defined by others and . . . unable to defend myself."

Tsongas

Wins in both states were virtually mandatory for Sen. Tsongas to remain a viable candidate. The former Massachusetts senator needed about $1 million for advertising in the next two weeks, said Mike Shea, president of Shea & Associates, Boston, Sen. Tsongas' campaign agency.

"Money comes when you win," he said Friday. "If we had had the money, I'm sure Clinton would have spent even more, forcing us to spend that much more on advertising."

The blaming of Sen. Tsongas' sudden pullout on media costs is likely to reinvigorate campaign reform proposals, including calls for free or cheaper airtime, said Bob Dreyfuss, public affairs director at Public Citizen, a campaign reform lobbying group.

"It is a fact of life that in an electronic democracy you need airtime and have to define yourself on electronic media," said Scott Miller, former creative director at McCann-Erickson Worldwide and a media adviser to the Tsongas campaign. "But we also need a reality check from those people who say we need more debates instead of ads."

The growing number of debates and other forums increases the importance of and need for advertising, Mr. Miller said.

"Maybe there should be free or cheaper airtime . . . but I don't see any need to limit the ability . . . to advertise," he said. "Look at what happened in the last debate. What did the media pick up—the exchange between Jerry Brown and Bill Clinton . . . and Paul Tsongas was nowhere to be found in that exchange."

Mr. Miller, a former partner in communications consultancy Sawyer/Miller Group, likened the growing need for political ad time to the advertising required for an established product. □

BK reviews promo biz

By Jon Lafayette and Scott Hume

Burger King Corp. is reviewing at least a portion of its estimated $75 million sales promotion account.

The No. 2 hamburger chain confirmed discussions have been held so far with six or seven promotion agencies and said it expects to talk with several more in upcoming weeks.

Burger King is seeking an agency of record to handle all family promotions, including adult programs designed to boost sales of its Weight Watchers entrees and the Pizza Firenze now being tested.

Such promotions have been handled by a variety of promotion agencies on a project basis.

Promotions targeted to children, including the chain's BK Kids Club, handled by Alcone Sims O'Brien, Irvine, Calif., aren't included in the review, industry executives say.

It's possible Burger King could consolidate the whole promotion account at Alcone, these sources say.

Burger King Director of Media Relations Cori Zywotow confirmed the review but wouldn't say whether all or part of the chain's promotion budget is involved or who Burger King has talked to.

Burger King's $215 million marketing budget includes both advertising and promotion spending, she said. Burger King spent about $140 million on media advertising in 1991, through D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles and Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, both New York.

An obvious and strong contender for the promotion account is Comart-KLP, Chicago, creator of the "Burger King Hidden Surprise Game" promotion, which starts next week.

The scratch-card game is part of the chain's yearlong promotional relationship with Walt Disney Co. The game, which runs through May 3, is tied to Walt Disney World Resorts, Coca-Cola Co. and Delta Air Lines. Prizes are worth $90 million.

Winners get trips to Walt Disney World, $100,000 in cash or Burger King menu items. Participating Burger King restaurants will offer 32-ounce Walt Disney World 20th Anniverary Collector Cups featuring Disney cartoon characters.

Four weeks of network TV, via Saatchi, supports the game. □

'Biz Week' to downplay ad-page game

By Scott Donaton

Business Week, the magazine industry's ad page leader since 1975, doesn't want to play the ad page game anymore.

Although staying on top is desirable, the McGraw-Hill weekly will focus on increasing net revenues per page and strengthening the bottom line, said Karl Spangenberg, senior VP-advertising sales.

In the past decade, Business Week and other magazines have resorted to sales practices that inflated the number of ad pages but eroded profit margins.

"Pages are great, but profitability and viability are going to dictate our business decisions," Mr. Spangenberg said. "Our challenge is to provide maximum value for our advertisers and our readers, and there are times when that goal comes into conflict with the number of pages you're going to get."

Specifically, "the previously relied-upon indicators of vitality, profitability and viability have to pass a new test of relevance, particularly the use of [Publishers Information Bureau] tabulations of ad pages and revenue as a measurement of success," he said.

"I think Business Week is fundamentally right, and I applaud them for that step," said Fortune Publisher James Hayes. "To win the PIB race has become an empty trophy. Your PIB might be great, but your internal profitability could be sinking fast."

Forbes, which briefly threatened Business Week's grip on the top last year, claims its rival is merely preparing industry watchers for the title's eventual fall.

"We're delighted to hear it because it means they're not so sure they're going to stay No. 1 in the future," Forbes Inc. Chairman Steve Forbes said.

Mr. Spangenberg disagreed, saying Business Week is acting from a leadership position and is taking steps to rebuild margins.

While admitting rate negotiation is a fact of life in the business field, Mr. Spangenberg said the Business Week sales force is being trained to focus less on price and more on audience demographics and editorial quality.

The magazine is also analyzing the profitability of its special ad sections, which should lead to a reduction in their number.

Ad rates were cut 1% last year in an attempt to ease the pressure to negotiate. And the title established a bonus plan that lets advertisers earn credits toward future buys, replacing a plan that awarded free pages.

Ad page and ad revenue figures as tracked by PIB are no longer considered valid indicators of a magazine's vitality because the figures include special ad sections and supplements and pages sold at steep discounts off the published rate.

Mr. Spangenberg stressed Business Week isn't condemning PIB. Rather, he said, publishers have misused PIB data by inflating the importance of ad page counts.

Jim Guthrie, exec VP-marketing development for the Magazine Publishers of America, which includes PIB, agreed.

"I don't know an ad agency or client that takes a look at ad page sales and sees that as indicative of a magazine's health," he said. "PIB was not designed as a promotional tool."

Ad pages "could be a sign of vitality," said Louis Schultz, exec VP-director of media services at Lintas:USA, New York, but a magazine's ad page rank isn't a real factor in buying decisions.

"They're right to question why they're taking pages at any price. It's a race for the meaningless," he said. "I don't really care who's No. 1."

The dogfight among the Big 3 business magazines—Business Week, Forbes and Fortune—intensified last year. Forbes briefly passed Business Week in ad pages after nine months and boasted of its achievement in ads from Doremus & Co.

But Business Week ultimately kept its crown, despite seeing ad pages fall 15.2% to 3,735 for the year. Forbes carried 3,573 ad pages, down 9.3%, while Fortune's 2,950 ad pages marked a 12.2% drop.

For the first time in several years, Business Week's yearend ads made no mention of its first-place finish, focusing instead on its news-gathering capabilities. Margeotes, Fertitta & Weiss is Business Week's agency.

"We could've put the No. 1 but chose not to because we feel, strategically, it really doesn't tell the story we need to focus on," Mr. Spangenberg said.

Winning the ad page race remains a priority at Forbes, however.

"We're working hard at it," Mr. Forbes said. "Excellence will be rewarded."

A first-place finish would be quite a feat for Forbes, published every other week. But Forbes counts ad pages from its quarterly "Forbes FYI" supplement and this fall will launch "ASAP," a quarterly high-technology supplement. □

Ad page dominance will no longer mean success, says Business Week's Karl Spangenberg.

Sponsorships up 18%

Whittle says event spending will supplant net TV

By Scott Hume

CHICAGO—Corporate investment in event sponsorships is growing so fast that only greed and perhaps the Internal Revenue Service can slow it down, attendees at a sponsorship conference were told last week.

This year, 4,500 companies will spend $3.3 billion on event sponsorships, nearly an 18% increase from what 4,200 companies spent last year, according to projections by the International Events Group, the conference sponsor.

In contrast, a 7% to 9% increase in measured media spending for 1992 is expected by Robert Coen, senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York.

That kind of growth should make the sponsorship industry optimistic but cautious, said keynote speaker Christopher Whittle, chairman of Whittle Communications. He said he expects "a dramatic reprogramming of advertising dollars" by major advertisers during the '90s. Anticipated changes include growth in event sponsorship until it supplants network TV as the primary recipient of top advertisers' budgets.

But event sponsorship faces several challenges, Mr. Whittle said. Event organizers must prove sponsorships' value with solid research and not rely on traditional media's inability to prove their worth, he said.

The charge that event promoters are weak on research has dogged the sponsorship industry for years. And the increasing interest in targeted audiences will put even more pressure on organizers to provide research proving events' effectiveness.

A second challenge Mr. Whittle outlined is the sponsorship industry's need to develop new areas of opportunity for marketers. Cause marketing, which targets a portion of proceeds from an event for charity, has helped sponsorship growth, he said. But the industry must evolve beyond it and devise new types of event marketing.

The third challenge is for the industry to avoid the traps that have ensnared traditional media.

"The key to events marketing's future is to protect the principle it was built on," Mr. Whittle said. "And that is to deliver 'specialness.' "

But the sponsorship industry faces a more immediate challenge: the IRS' revised guidelines on taxing corporate sponsorships of non-profit organizations.

After auditing Mobil Corp.'s sponsorship of college football's Cotton Bowl, the IRS classified that money as "unrelated business taxable income," taxable at a rate of 34%. If that ruling is applied to all corporate sponsorships, as the proposed tax-code revision would do, the sponsorship industry is at risk.

Smaller events would suffer the most dramatic falloff in support, predicted Jim Andrews, International Events Group editorial director. But larger events would feel the effects as well, he said.

The IRS will accept public comment on the new tax guidelines until April 3. □

Cola war bubbles in Japan

By David Kilburn

TOKYO—The diet cola war is hitting Japan with a vengeance.

Pepsi-Cola Japan has persuaded at least one national newspaper to run a hard-hitting comparative ad campaign breaking today to introduce 1-calorie Diet Pepsi.

The company is expected to try to convince the TV networks to run a broadcast version.

Pepsi's attack comes as Coca-Cola Japan introduces its own 1-calorie Caffeine Free Diet Coke and marks the second recent use of comparative advertising, a rarity in Japan. General Motors Corp. earlier this month broke a campaign comparing its cars with competitive Japanese models.

"We think McCann-Erickson Hakuhodo's comparative ad campaign for General Motors has helped to change the climate," said Toshitake Yamagishi, marketing director for Pepsi-Cola Japan.

Copy shown with the Diet Pepsi can reads: "For those who would like to gain more calories—we don't recommend Diet Pepsi—we recommend Coca-Cola Light. The reason? The calorie content of Diet Pepsi is one-12th that of Coca-Cola Light." Diet Pepsi has 1 calorie per 100-milliliter serving, like the new Caffeine Free Diet Coke, compared with 12 calories per 100 milliliters for Coca-Cola Light.

So far, Nihon Keizai Shimbun has agreed to run the ad. At press time, Pepsi was still in talks with the Asahi Shimbun and Yomiuri Shimbun and is expected to talk to several TV networks.

GLOBAL NEWS

"Since this campaign is based on clearly established facts and meets the Fair Trade Commission's guidelines for comparative advertising, we think the TV stations will accept it," Mr. Yamagishi said.

Nakahata Advertising Production Co. created the ad; Asatsu, a BBDO Worldwide affiliate and Pepsi's agency of record, is handling media.

Last year, Pepsi aired the comparative Hammer commercial "Feelings" for Pepsi despite objections by Coca-Cola.

Coca-Cola dominates the $1.65 billion Japanese cola market with 70% for its flagship brand and 20% for Coca-Cola Light, according to industry estimates. Pepsi claims it increased its market share several percentage points last year to almost 10%.

Those in the industry say Pepsi hopes to sell 3.5 million cases of Diet Pepsi this year to achieve about a 2% share. Sales of Pepsi itself are expected to reach 20 million cases, increasing the main brand's share to as much as 13% this year.

Coca-Cola denied the Caffeine Free Diet Coke introduction was a reaction to Pepsi.

"We are simply building our business by offering the consumer more choice," said Robert Harland, senior VP-external affairs.

Two TV commercials by Lintas:Hakuhodo breaking March 28 show a young woman in a fashionably short skirt walking along a city street with her image reflected in windows. The spots intercut scenes showing her drinking the new brand with other scenes, such as swimming and at aerobics.

Industry executives estimate Coca-Cola will spend about $80 million on cola advertising this year, up 33.3% from 1991. Pepsi's spending is expected to rise by the same percentage to $16 million. □

Even 'B' videos are getting the bucks

By Laurie Freeman

Now playing at your local video rental store: Promotions for little-known releases.

With few hits due on tape in the near future, and with rental chains being more selective in the tapes they buy, studios are creating advertising and promotional efforts for all types of videos.

Promotions that once might have been saved only for blockbuster films are now being used to hype smaller-scale titles like collections and non-theatrical releases.

"People are more selective, even with rental titles, and retailers are more careful about how many of each title they're going to stock," says Van Wallach, senior editor of the trade magazine Video Store.

These promotional efforts go beyond extra ad spending, which has steadily increased over the years.

According to figures from LNA/-Arbitron Multi-Media Service, home video marketers spent more than $101 million to advertise pre-recorded tapes in 1990, the latest full-year figures available. This amount marks a 60.3% increase from 1987, when $63 million was spent.

Industry observers say full-year spending in 1991 should be modestly higher than 1990, and the same trend is expected for 1992.

Video retailers have kept pace with the studios' spending. According to LNA, Blockbuster Video, West Coast Video and MTS' Tower Records combined to spend $39.8 million in the 12 months ended September 1991. This figure marks a 17.9% jump from the previous 12 months.

The current rash of promotional activity by home video marketers focuses on the rental segment.

Many home videos' advertising and promotion budgets have topped $1 million apiece. Typically, a "B" title's advertising and promotion budget is around $500,000, says Bob Alexander, president of consultancy Alexander & Associates.

Coca-Cola USA and Warner Bros. Records were part of the "Boyz N the Hood" video promotion.

Home Box Office's video division funneled $2 million into a consumer and retail campaign for its recent release of "Don't Tell Mom the Babysitter's Dead."

The campaign gave retailers and consumers a chance to win a 1956 Buick by taking a phone-in "pop quiz" about the movie. To encourage retailers, HBO Video told store owners to call an 800 number and the public to call a 900 number.

"The retailers are the ones going into their pocket to pay $60 to $65 a cassette, and in this case, we wanted them to have a feel for what the film is about," says Peter Liguori, VP-new releases at HBO Video.

As a result, the release sold better than anticipated. HBO shipped 250,000 copies of the film, which grossed only $25 million in theaters.

In addition, studios are creating cross-promotions for films other than megahits.

Columbia/TriStar Home Video assembled an estimated $3 million cross-promotional marketing campaign this month with Coca-Cola USA, Warner Bros. Records and American Urban Radio Networks to promote the home video release of "Boyz N the Hood."

The studio also created a multi-million dollar campaign featuring tie-ins with Sony Corp. of America, for its blank tapes, and Hershey Foods Corp.'s Kit Kat candy bars backing the release of "Oscar's Greatest Moments," 20 years of highlights from the Academy of Motion Pictures Arts & Sciences awards show.

The promotion partners helped Columbia TriStar Home Video ship more than 330,000 units of "Boyz N the Hood" and 800,000 units of "Oscar's Greatest Moments" to video retailers, says Bill Perrault, VP-marketing.

Ken Graffeo, VP-marketing for the West Coast Video rental chain, says a studio's total marketing program influences what titles and how many copies the chain buys.

"When a studio ties in with a national advertiser, we know there will be a higher awareness level and greater purchase or rental intent on the part of the consumer," he says.

Normally, marketers will consider cross-promotions only for films that grossed at least $30 million at the box office. But, Mr. Wallach says, "That may change as marketers find that niche and smaller films may help them reach a specific audience."

But even if studios can't enlist cross-promotional partners, they'll have to maintain, if not increase, their promotional activity in the rental market.

"The more promotional pressure by the studios, the more consumer demand there is, which means we buy more copies," says Ron Castell, senior VP-programming and communications at Blockbuster. □

That's entertainment spending!

IF YOU THOUGHT BALLROOM DANCING IN ST. PETERSBURG MEANT CHA CHA, FOXTROT, RUMBA...

You're starting off on the wrong foot.

While St. Petersburg — and the entire Tampa Bay area — was once considered a sleepy place, ideal for retirees alone, this is no longer true. In fact, the influx of new, young residents to the St. Petersburg area has lowered the city's median age by nearly eight years since 1980.

So it's not surprising that St. Petersburg's newly renovated Coliseum ballroom, once host to big bands and swing, now attracts sell-out crowds of young people to each of its sock hops, held monthly since 1989.

And it's not surprising either that Tampa Bay keeps up with the Times. The St. Petersburg Times, Tampa Bay's largest newspaper, beats the Tampa Tribune in metro circulation by nearly 107,000 papers daily and more than 122,500 on Sunday.*

So get in step with Tampa Bay. Call 1-800-333-7505, ext. 8249, for the latest information on this thriving market and the newspaper that serves it best.

All-sports radio scores

Veterans strong as converts join format lineup

By Alan Salomon

AM stations do well with an all-sports format if they concentrate on local sports, carry some play-by-play, run call-in talk shows and emphasize entertainment in the morning, general managers say.

At least four stations nationwide have begun all-sports programming in the past year.

The latest to join the fray is KMPC, Los Angeles, which will switch next month from an all-news format. In January, WSCR, Chicago, started up and KASP, St. Louis, switched from an oldies format. The fourth, KFAN, Minneapolis, switched from a country format last August.

Because the stations' biggest audience group is young males, the strongest ad categories include auto, beer, soft drinks and travel.

Most all-sports stations are in the top 25 markets; some executives don't think there's room for the format in midmarket cities without major league teams.

WFAN, New York, adopted the format in July 1987 and is considered the all-sports pioneer. Infinity Broadcasting bought the station in January from Emmis Broadcasting for $70 million; the deal is pending Federal Communications Commission approval. The station mixes Don Imus' morning drive-time show with play-by-play and local sports coverage.

MEDIA WORKS

WFAN handles play-by-play for the Mets, Rangers and Knicks, guaranteeing live coverage of a local team nearly every night.

"Play-by-play is a necessity for success in this format. Throughout the day, there [can only be] so much talk," said Rick Rosenfelt, WFAN sales manager.

The station earned a 1.1 share in the fall ratings period, flat from the year before, according to Arbitron Co. WFAN's biggest advertisers are Anheuser-Busch and Coca-Cola Co.

In Minneapolis, KFAN earned a 1.2 share of all listeners 12 and older for fall 1991, just after its switch in August. That compares with a 0.4 share from the summer 1991 period, according to Arbitron.

XTRA, San Diego, posted a 4.2 share for men 18 and older in Arbitron's November-January ratings period; the station switched from news/sports in October 1990. XTRA moved to No. 6 in the market, up from No. 16 before the format change. The station projects a 47% rise in ad revenues this year, mostly among upscale marketers targeting men, said Tom McKinley, general manager.

WIP, Philadelphia, posted a 9.2 share among men 25-54 in Arbitron's fall 1991 book, up from a 6.4 share the year before under its adult contemporary format. The station switched in September 1988.

VP-General Manager Ken Nanus credits the fall ratings in part to coverage of Eagles games; however, the station recently lost the rights to carry Eagles games to WYSP-AM. □

TV ad prices flat or falling; print up

Media prices aren't likely to rise much in 1992 despite political advertising, the Olympics or a possible economic turnaround. Here's how prices compare with 1991:

KIMBERLY MART

NEW YORK—Many advertisers predict they will pay less or the same for broadcast media this year, despite the Olympics and political advertising.

Network TV and syndication are expected to see the steepest declines, according to DeWitt Media's January survey of 102 advertisers.

Spot radio prices are also predicted to drop from a year ago.

Advertisers expect magazines, newspapers and outdoor to cost more this year.

Some respondents said the soft economy will keep the Olympics and politics from tightening the marketplace, as they traditionally have. One said, "Only an increase in real consumer demand will lead to a corresponding increase in advertising." □

Subsidy

ing budget with their hard-earned money," Rep. Armey said. "There is no reason for the most successful American firms to be feeding at the government trough. The overall dollar figures are substantial, but any one grant is a tiny fraction of the ad budgets of a Hershey" or other major marketer.

David McGuire, the Agriculture Department's deputy director for marketing, said the program's primary mission is to see that U.S. commodities—cotton, walnuts, prunes or avocados—are promoted abroad.

Most of the federal dollars are dispersed by commodity groups, such as the Chocolate Manufacturers Association, National Pasta Association or Kentucky Distillers, to individual marketers based on criteria OK'd by the Agriculture Department, Mr. McGuire said.

"We didn't administer this thing on the basis of the size of a company or its ownership," he said. "Pillsbury got about $2 million for [promoting] sweet corn even though it's owned by [U.K. conglomerate] Grand Metropolitan. And the reason it's not a concern is because it's U.S.-grown corn they're selling . . . What is relevant is that this program makes for more jobs."

Gallo, for example, with an estimated annual ad budget of $100 million, got $5.1 million in 1991, the Agriculture Department said.

Other top fund recipients included Sunkist Growers (nearly $10 million in 1991 and $31.4 million since 1989), Blue Diamond Growers ($6.2 million), Sunsweet ($3.7 million), Sun-Maid Growers of California ($3.7 million) and Pillsbury ($3 million, see chart on Page 1).

Other major marketers also showed up on the list, including Hershey Chocolate USA at $612,500 and McDonald's Corp. at $465,000.

The program has several problems, said an aide to Rep. Peter Kostmayer (D., Pa.), who's cosponsoring legislation to revamp the subsidy fund.

"The U.S. Tobacco Associates got $3.5 million to promote U.S. tobacco abroad, which would seem to be a contradiction vis-a-vis the Department of Health & Human Services stance on smoking here at home," said Jeff Tenenbaum, Rep. Kostmayer's aide. "And the same thing goes for paying to promote whiskey."

He also questioned whether the Agriculture Department makes sure the money is spent in compliance with departmental regulations requiring the promotion to note a product's U.S. origin.

"The General Accounting Office says that rarely is it known what these companies use the money for," he said. "The verification is pathetic."

Rep. Kostmayer is proposing a $500,000 limit on annual funding to any marketer. A marketer wouldn't be eligible if annual sales exceeded $500,000.

The Agriculture Department's Mr. McGuire acknowledged the controversial nature of the program but said eliminating it would also take away any guarantee that McDonald's, for example, would use and promote U.S.-grown chicken products overseas.

"If McDonald's promotes Chicken McNuggets in Singapore, there is no correlation—certainly no guarantee—that it will be selling U.S.-grown chicken," he said. "For them to qualify, they have to [use] only U.S. product. This is an enticement for them to do that. We think McDonald's is a great way to promote [U.S.] chicken, and the best thing for that is to give this money to McDonald's."

Susan Smith, VP-public and legal affairs of the Chocolate Manufacturers Association, defended the goal of the program.

"We didn't ask for this program, but if increasing sales abroad is the goal, we can do something about it," she said. "We try to make sure that all companies can be part of the program. It's true that big companies are usually the ones that can boost exports, and it's true that many of those companies have big ad budgets, but Mars has been fighting for years to get into Asian markets. They can legitimately use this money."

M&M/Mars got $1.1 million in subsidy dollars last year. Hans Fiuczynski, external relations spokesman for the company, dismissed criticism of the program as "pretty much a political thing."

He said foreign competitors rely far more heavily on government supports and said the chocolate marketer would have done less undercut by Argentinian and Chilean manufacturers. The funding allows farmers to create demand for U.S. products by brand."

"There is no reason for the most successful American firms to be feeding at the government trough."

Mr. Dillon noted that companies like Welch, a co-op of 1,600 grape growers, wouldn't be able to advertise overseas without the federal funding.

He also challenged the argument that midsize and large companies can well afford to advertise overseas without government subsidies.

"If we had our last quarter of a million dollars, we probably wouldn't have spent it to promote product overseas," he said. "We'd just as soon spent it on one more FSI in the U.S. If they want us to compete, the government has to help us."

Welch, he said, was approved for $1.2 million to market grape products in Japan and the Far East but opted to receive only $225,000.

Robert Gillespie, president of CPC International's Best Foods division, also defended the program.

The U.S. unit of the giant international player got $162,500 last year to promote Skippy peanut butter and a total of $974,500 in the past three years.

Mr. Gillespie said the program has worked for Best Foods. He said the company's peanut butter business in Taiwan has increased fivefold since 1988. Some funds were also used to introduce Skippy peanut butter into Sweden.

He said Best Foods applied for the funds because others were doing it "and we can't be at a competitive disadvantage."

When asked whether such a small amount of money was enough to do a full-scale promotional launch in a foreign market, Mr. Gillespie said: "When you're going into a market like Tonga, $162,000 goes a long, long way."

Those explanations, however, carried no appeal for Rep. Armey. "This program cries out for termination," he said. □ zines to strengthen their ties to customers and control the editorial environment in which their ads appear.

In September, Hachette Magazines will launch custom titles for Jenny Craig International and Mary Kay Cosmetics. They join titles published by Benetton Group, IBM Corp., Pillsbury Co. and Slim-Fast Foods Co., among others.

And more publishers are exploring family-oriented magazines as part of the return, real or perceived, of "traditional" values. Walt Disney Co. last month acquired FamilyFun from founders Jake Winebaum and U.S. News & World Report. Ladies' Home Journal and Parenting each launched family activity spinoffs in the past year.

McDonald's has tried its hand at in-house publishing ventures before, without much success. In 1985, it briefly tested in-store distribution of Now, a music and entertainment magazine for teen-agers, published for the chain by SMI. The title carried some McDonald's advertising but no outside ads and was quickly dropped.

McDonald's later tried McDonald's Funland Times, a comic book for kids, again without success.

The chain also has its eye on other in-store media. In November, McDonald's and Turner Broadcasting System announced an "agreement in principle to explore development" of a dedicated TV channel for all domestic McDonald's stores. That project is proceeding, but no in-store tests have been conducted yet. □

Where are you going, Charlotte?

By Gary Levin and Scott Hume

Beers

Where will Charlotte Beers land?

The answer is: Probably at a New York agency.

The career plan of the former Tatham/RSCG ceo was Madison Avenue's biggest guessing game last week.

"It's likely that I will join with another agency, but absolutely no agreement has been reached with any other agency," Ms. Beers told Advertising Age. "I've had serious dialogues with some people in the industry, but no decision has been reached."

It is believed by some that Ms. Beers already has sewn up her next career move but just isn't telling. That's because Ms. Beers

McD's may be fried by database rental

By Scott Hume

McDonald's is stepping into database marketing, and it could stub its toe.

In an area covering eastern Maryland and southern New Jersey and parts of Delaware, McDonald's Corp. restaurants are inviting customers to join the McDonald's VIP Club by filling out a form with their name, address, home phone number, sex and birth date.

Members are promised a membership card, special offers on their birthday, a newsletter and McDonald's coupons by mail.

But they may receive more than they bargained for.

Qualified Lists Corp., which is compiling the database for McDonald's, is offering to rent the list to outside parties.

The list-management company last week placed an ad in trade publication DM News announcing availability of the membership list for rental by companies that could use it for solicitations.

The ad says lists could be broken out for "insurance, publications, catalogs & opportunity seekers."

The experiences of Blockbuster Entertainment Corp., Lotus Development Corp. and others have shown list rental to be a sensitive issue with consumers.

A Dec. 26, 1990, article in The Wall Street Journal saying Blockbuster planned to rent lists of customer rentals at its video stores stirred up an immediate controversy. Federal law forbids video stores from disclosing information on movies customers rent, and Blockbuster quickly denied it had any plans to rent out names.

Lotus pulled its planned Lotus:

Niagara Falls, home of honeymooners and kitsch, will soon get its very own transcendental theme park.

Canadian magician Doug Henning and Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, the founder of the Transcendental Meditation movement, are planning a 1,400 acre, $690 million theme park just down the road from the falls. Mr. Henning said $42 million has been budgeted for ads and promotion before the park opens, and $11 million annually once the park gets going.

The park is searching for an ad agency, said Rick Weberg VP of Maharishi Veda Land Canada Inc., Toronto.

Puris may join Bush team

NEW YORK—Ammirati & Puris President Martin Puris is the leading contender to take over the top spot on President Bush's campaign ad team, several sources said. Mr. Puris, a longtime acquaintance of Bush campaign Chairman Robert Teeter, had acknowledged meeting with Mr. Teeter. Mr. Puris, who previously said he wouldn't be able to leave his agency, now said he might be able to work out a scenario that would let him stay in touch with his agency's work while devoting more and more time to the campaign.

Bailout for Mediators

Barter media rivals may join to settle debts

By Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—Leading barter media companies are banding together to propose a multimillion-dollar bailout for the Mediators, the financially troubled barter media company.

The group is making the unusual move in an attempt to salvage the barter media industry's reputation, severely damaged by negative publicity surrounding questionable business practices by the Mediators. The company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection Sept. 13.

Media companies, including TV and radio stations and radio and cable networks, are owed more than $30 million for time they provided for the Mediators' clients.

The Mediators also owes several clients $90 million for barter goods and services provided to the company for media credits that were never delivered.

The bailout group comprises members of the Corporate Trade Council of the International Reciprocal Trade Association, which represents most major barter media companies.

Companies represented include Active Media Service, Atwood Richards Inc., CSI International Corp., International Remarketing and Tradewell International, all New York.

The association's ethics policy committee recently passed a resolution approving the bailout plan and is expected to offer the proposal this week to attorney David Dykhouse, a partner at Patterson, Belknap, Webb & Tyler.

The law firm represents a creditors committee made up of media companies owed money by the Mediators. Capital Cities/ABC Co. is believed to be the largest media creditor.

"We have passed the resolution and we are working on a proposal," said Midge Tyner, chairman of Tradewell, who serves as ethics policy committee chairwoman. She referred all other questions to Mr. Dykhouse, who couldn't be reached for comment.

Media companies on the creditors committee say they've had discussions with several

Media spending falls 8.1%; P&G still on top

By Julie Liesse

U.S. measured media spending last year fell 8.1% to $37.8 billion, reflecting corporate belt-tightening and the recession, figures released last week by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service showed.

The nation's top 10 advertisers cut spending 5.2%, while spending by the top 25 fell 4.5%.

Although No. 1 Procter & Gamble Co. has said it's trying to return promotion dollars into media spending, that wasn't the case last year: The package-goods and cosmetics marketer's media spending fell 4.7%.

The two biggest percentage declines among the top 10 were by No. 10 AT&T Co., down 22.5%, and No. 6 Sears, Roebuck & Co., down 21.7%. Moving into the top 10 was No. 8 General Mills, up 3.1%.

The spending drops may reflect a shift to less-expensive media rather than less advertising. Sears, for instance, spent 35% less on newspaper advertising, benefiting from contract renegotiations with major chains; the retail and financial services giant also moved money out of network TV and into cable and spot TV.

Network radio, newspapers and network TV were the biggest losers in overall spending, while spending on syndicated and cable TV was up. Newspaper spending fell 23.2% to $6.8 billion; magazine expenditures were down 3.3% to $6.5 billion.

While network TV fell 6.7% to $9.46 billion, syndicated TV jumped 16.6% to $1.85 billion and cable TV rose 9.1% to $1.2 billion.

Network radio fell 24.5% to $578.5 million.

McDonald's Corp., one of the largest network TV buyers, cut network spending 25% to $171.8 million, and fell out of the top 10 to No. 11.

Other notable changes among the top 25 advertisers included big increases by two pharmaceuticals marketers: No. 20 American Home Products Corp. was up 24% to $290.6 million, while No. 14 Johnson & Johnson increased spending 21.7% to $371.1 million.

Especially large drops were chalked up by two package-goods giants: No. 17 Grand Metropolitan's spending fell 18.8% to $326.7 million, while No. 21 RJR Nabisco was down 18.3% to $285.5 million. □

Ads become sitcoms

Domino's fights for share

By John P. Cortez

Domino's Pizza is using a familiar sitcom face in its new "mini-sitcom" ad strategy that breaks in April.

Bronson Pinchot of ABC's "Perfect Strangers" will star in a series of seven TV spots from Grey Advertising, New York.

Steve Novick, exec VP-director of creative services at Grey, described the commercials as "mini-sitcoms."

"We're taking the 23-minute sitcom and shrinking it down to a 30-second format," he said.

The new campaign is designed to revive sales for Domino's, which last year reported its first decline ever—nearly 10% to $2.4 billion.

Domino's will also use the advertising to fight off Pizza Hut's foray into home delivery. In five years of limited regional delivery, PepsiCo's Pizza Hut has won 20% of the estimated $6 billion home delivery segment. Since 1989, Domino's share of the segment has dropped 10 points to 46%.

Though Mr. Novick said some 15-second spots would be a part of the campaign, the first spot is a :30 that features Mr. Pinchot, as himself, using Domino's to capture the attention of a young woman. He intentionally has a pizza delivered to the wrong address so he can set up a rendezvous to recover it.

The other spots will follow the same concept, Mr. Novick said, showing Mr. Pinchot teaming with Domino's to solve a dilemma or achieve an ulterior motive.

Bronson Pinchot will star in Domino's "mini-sitcoms."

The spots are an evolution of the campaign's first phase that broke last September. The earlier commercials will be phased out, along with celebrities who appeared in them, including comedian Larry "Bud" Melman and Indiana University basketball coach Bob Knight. Mr. Pinchot will be the only celebrity involved in Domino's spots this year, Mr. Novick said.

The "Nobody knows like Domino's" slogan continues. □

Gap unit's ads hike to N.Y.

By Bradley Johnson

There's now a 2,900-mile gap between the Gap and Banana Republic.

The Gap Inc. last week moved advertising for its higher-price Banana Republic chain to a new house agency in New York from the Gap's San Francisco in-house shop. Main operations for Banana Republic remain in San Francisco.

Last week, Sam Shahid, formerly creative director at CRK Advertising, Calvin Klein's in-house agency in New York, joined Banana Republic as VP-creative director, a new post. He will oversee a seven-person creative department.

Previously, Banana Republic advertising was managed by Magdalene Gross, senior VP-creative director with the Gap, the company's fast-growing flagship retail operation known for its stylish print ads and basic but trendy T-shirts and jeans.

Mr. Shahid said the ad shift culminates a makeover at Banana Republic, which has moved away from the safari look of the '80s to more fashionable apparel.

But the revamped Banana Republic tends to look like a high-price Gap. And, Mr. Shahid acknowledged, Banana Republic ads look like the Gap's.

Last year, Banana Republic spent $3.9 million on measured media, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, while the Gap spent $15.2 million.

Banana Republic's marketing challenge, Mr. Shahid said, is to create an image and advertising look that is distinct from the Gap. The first campaign from the new house agency will break this fall. □

WHERE CAR MARKETERS ARE HEADED

Exclusive J.D. Power survey uncovers media shifts and future direction

AUTOMOTIVE MARKETING

About this report

After a decade in which quality drove the automobile market and Detroit's Big 3 chased the Japanese, vehicles now are essentially at par, according to J.D. Power & Associates, the guru of customer satisfaction. Detroit needs to get that message to buyers. Japanese importers need to hold on to customers without the advantage of being patently superior. Europeans, caught in the crossfire, must retain their niches. For each, marketing is ever more essential.

To examine marketing tactics and trends for model years 1992 through 1996, Automotive News and Advertising Age commissioned J.D. Power to conduct a proprietary survey of top marketing executives at auto companies and their agencies. Then, nearly two dozen veteran reporters and editors were assigned the task of finding out more—in Chicago, Detroit, Frankfurt, London, Los Angeles, Nashville, New York and Tokyo.

Advertising Age and Automotive News, news leaders in their respective industries and sister publications within Crain Communications Inc., combined forces for this Special Report. Average paid circulation for Advertising Age is 85,163; for Automotive News, 77,620. The report is part of both publications; we hope you find it profitable.

From the survey:

- Don't sell ragtops in a blizzard, and other lessons in learning regional tastes. S-4
- 'Safety first' is no longer a crash course when it comes to developing ad message. S-4
- As carmakers cut costs, nagging incentives should come under control by mid-decade. S-8
- Attention to basics and ability to follow through wins admiration for Toyota. S-14
- Respondents expect six auto account reviews in the next two years. S-16
- Cross-media packages are easy to covet but hard to connect. S-22
- All signals look green, as environment concerns move to the front. S-34

J.D. Power & Associates in November and December 1991 surveyed the top advertising executives at 33 automotive manufacturing or marketing companies and a similar number of high-ranking executives at ad agencies serving them. A total of 206 executives were contacted; 71 responded. Responses were anonymous, but they reflected the desired mix: just under half were from agencies and just over half were from marketers. Some 46% represented Asian nameplates, 30% work for the Big 3 and 24% work for European nameplates.

Also inside:

- Ignore the whining; Big 3 get the hint and are listening to the constituency. S-8
- The young copywriters behind the agency wheels of some 'hot car' ads. S-14; S-30; S-42; S-44

- Critical auto issues vary by location; we take a region-to-region pulse. S-24; S-26; S-50; S-51
- In Europe, image is everything or, as exec says, 'Lexus, Infiniti are fantastic but lack class.' S-52

Inventing rules in unusual market

Tradition goes out the window as carmakers try anything to win in a 'replacement' category

By Raymond Serafin

Philip Guarascio's ideal marketing plan looks something like this: He'd park a General Motors Corp. vehicle in front of the home of anyone in the market for a new car or truck and hand over the keys for a trial spin.

"If I have a 70% assurance that you're going to buy a car in the next month, and I know you'll buy a compact sedan, and I have a fair shot at you [considering a GM product], then even though it would be expensive to get the car to your house, this could be the most efficient thing I could do," says Mr. Guarascio, GM's executive-in-charge of corporate marketing and advertising.

That sort of auto marketing isn't as farfetched as it might seem.

As auto companies and their agencies develop more information about consumers' buying patterns, lifestyles and media habits, the rifle-shot approach to marketing continues to grow—often at the expense of traditional media.

Strategies are in for a drastic change, according to an exclusive survey of key automotive marketing decision-makers conducted for Automotive News and Advertising Age by J.D. Power & Associates.

About three-fourths of automotive marketing dollars, excluding dealer and consumer incentive programs, are allocated to media placements, the survey found.

But while automakers per-

Marketing execs itch to fill the right niche

A veritable banquet of media choices awaits the forward-thinking car company

By John P. Cortez

As media choices multiply, automakers are picking their niches more than ever before.

According to the J.D. Power & Associates survey of automakers and their agencies, the use of niche media will continue to grow. Of those surveyed, 90% said niche media will be more important in the next five years, while 67.2% said mass media will grow less important.

Niche-media programs include direct mail, product-oriented videocassettes, rental cassette and movie theater commercials, "place-based" media in airports or grocery stores and advertising on computer information services such as Prodigy.

It's difficult to figure how much money automakers are devoting to niche-media programs in general. As one example, General Motors Corp.'s Buick division devoted about 40% of the ad budget for its Roadmaster launch to such an effort.

McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Troy, Mich., agency for Buick, used a technique dubbed "McMapping" to target 4,900 specific ZIP codes for a magazine buy last year, and more recently used an incentive program for the Buick LeSabre in which targeted magazine subscribers received an ink-jetted card offering them a free video for taking a test drive.

"McMapping" allows the marketer to better understand the individual consumer through a five-step process that comprises demographic and lifestyle analyses, synthesized and tested data, and details of consumers' media choices, says Karen Ritchie, senior VP-director of media services at ceive media advertising as somewhat more effective than promotional efforts, they believe the differences have narrowed over the last five years and will continue to narrow in the next five years, according to the Power survey.

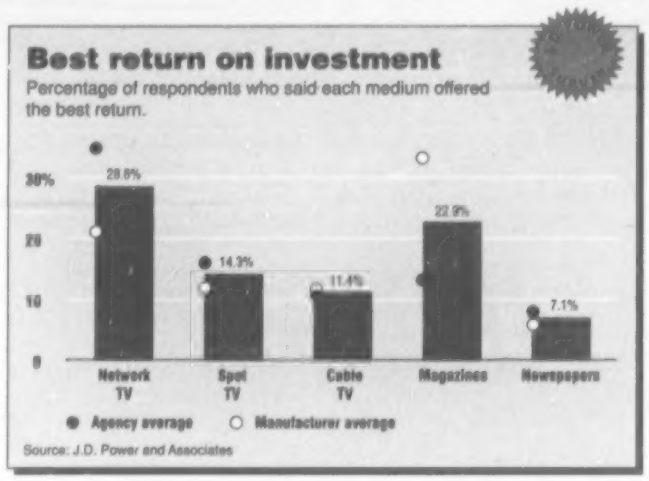
Automakers' changing strategies are blurring all the old distinctions in media. Advertisers and agencies are attempting to integrate various marketing tools, with less regard to fixed notions about the value of traditional advertising vs. disciplines such as sales promotion, direct marketing, event sponsorships and PR.



Influence budgets

At GM, marketing divisions don't have ad budgets; they have "consumer influence" budgets.

"The way we define media is that it's all the tools or processes that let us create a communications link with the consumer," says Mr. Guarascio. Delivering a test car to a prospect's door thus becomes a media tactic.

Similarly broad attitudes about media are becoming widespread through the auto industry.

"There isn't one simple rule that applies to our media strategy," says James Julow, manager-advertising and media relations at Chrysler Corp.

Several converging factors make it more important than ever that auto marketers effectively use media even as it becomes more complex to develop successful media strategies.

The U.S. auto market has exploded with competitors over the last decade. New brands entered the fray, among them Acura, Range Rover, Lexus, Infiniti, Saturn and Hyundai. Sterling came and went, a pattern Daihatsu is repeating. Peugeot dropped out, but new dealer networks are being organized to sell the likes of Amati, Kia and even a street-legal version of the Hummer military vehicle.

600 to chose from

Many of the recent entrants are niche players, and the number of car and truck models has proliferated, totaling more than 600 now, according to some estimates.

Only a relative handful of models sell in large volumes anymore. In the mid-1960s, Chevrolet sold about 1.5 million Impalas in a single year. Last year's top selling vehicle was the Ford F-series pickup, at 442,311 units.

A mature, essentially replacement, market means a company can grow only by taking share from a rival; but now there are more rivals than ever to divvy up the share.

Confusion reigns

Meanwhile, more consumer choice also means more confusion.

All this is taking place as network TV rapidly loses its once overwhelmingly dominant position as an advertising medium. And TV itself now includes a fourth broadcast network plus cable TV.

New media possibilities have emerged, such as personal computers, home videos and out-of-home media that reach consumers in places such as airport terminals, doctors' offices and health clubs.

"You just don't have the Beav and Ward and June watching TV together from 8 to 11 prime time," says Tom Somerset, senior VP-director of marketing services in the Santa Ana, Calif., office of Foote, Cone & Belding, agency for Mazda Motor of America. "You have to identify the prospects and follow them through the day."

Traditional media still figure importantly in auto marketing plans, but they're being looked at in non-traditional ways.

A media switch

"We're really looking at far more targeting and less use of media in a mass way. It doesn't mean we won't use mass media, but we'll use it in a more targeted way," says Richard O'Connor, chairman-ceo of Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., agency for GM's Chevrolet division.

The old cost-per-thousand standard for buying media has been reinterpreted as databases enable marketers to pinpoint how to reach specific prospects.

"We no longer look at gross households. What we look at is the targeted cost," says Chrysler's Mr. Julow. "If you have great confidence in what you know, it can wildly change the CPM."

Chrysler, which is re-examining its media strategy, is considering dropping out of prime-time network TV advertising because other media offer more targeted audiences, says John Damoose, VP-marketing.

McCann-Erickson.

"What comes out," she says, "is a scope that is much broader than 'Do I use cable TV to reach this target?' "

One reason for the growth in niche media is that accountability methods have improved somewhat. Accountability and evaluation are an important aspect of niche marketing.

"There's been a tremendous increase in accountability the last four or five years —it means knowing what works and why, and what things don't work, and why," says GM's Philip Guarascio, executive-in-charge of corporate marketing and advertising. "A lot of our efforts have been directed at understanding the value of [media] tools, creating situations and defining what the mix should be.

"If you look at GM budgeting from a share standpoint," he continues, "nontraditional media are increasing at a faster rate [than in the past]."

Not all automakers are accepting the accountability of niche media, however.

"One of the inherent problems with niche-marketing opportunities is evaluation," says Joseph Caponigro, senior VP-director of media services at Dodge agency BBDO Worldwide, Southfield, Mich. "We can 'guesstimate' numbers, but it is difficult to ascertain audience measurement."

A positive price/value relationship must be demonstrated for a company to invest in a niche medium, says Robert Mancini, senior VP-director of media services at J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, agency for Ford Motor Co.'s Ford Division.

"Sometimes you're willing to pay a premium to get a very specific audience that has a much higher propensity to buy your product in an environment that you can't get anywhere else," he says. "For a mass marketer, it makes sense to target for a specific product, but it won't be done at the expense of the mass media budget."

Evaluating the success of a niche-media buy from sales figures is "futile," says Ben Hilverda, director-marketing for Audi of America.

The European auto importer, which also uses a ZIP code-targeted magazine schedule, includes a toll-free number in its advertising to measure response. For the launch of the Audi 100, the 800 line received 60,000 calls in six weeks.

Despite its increased significance, niche media haven't captured all marketers' affections.

Ford Motor Co. was among the first automakers involved in both the Checkout Channel, an in-supermarket, place-based medium run by Turner Broadcasting System and Prodigy, the joint-venture, on-line computer service of IBM Corp. and Sears, Roebuck & Co. But the automaker won't be spending significant portions of its ad budget on niche media in the near future, says John Vanderzee, advertising manager for Ford Division.

"Home video advertising, doctors' offices, Airport Channel, grocery stores—we've had proposals from everyone," says Mr. Vanderzee. "We have yet to find one that makes a lot of sense to us. People sitting in an airport waiting for a flight, [or] at a supermarket checkout counter, they're not looking at it, from what we can see. It's not conducive to what they want to do. They want to get out of that line as quickly as they can."

"Niche media can go all the way to toilet stalls," he says. "I can tell you we'll probably not get involved in any of it."

Don't sell ragtops in a blizzard

In battle for share, carmakers acquire a feeling for regional tastes

By Raymond Serafin and Cleveland Horton

When Ford Motor Co.'s Ford Division began its regional test last fall of a one-price/one set of options strategy for Escort, it equipped the cars with air conditioning, AM-FM stereo radio and rear-window defroster.

But dealers and marketing officials in the Southeast wanted different options to suit their buyers' preferences, and Ford, traditionally slow to adapt to regional change, went along with it.

Hence, the $9,995 Escorts bound for the Southeast were given a cassette player instead of the defroster that went in those bound for the West and Northeast.

"That was seen as a better value in that area," says Keith Magee, Ford Division's general marketing manager.

That also illustrates one of the growing trends in automotive marketing—the regionalization of approaches involving product, communications messages and media usage.

The J.D. Power & Associates survey of key auto marketing decision makers reflects that trend.

Spot TV will receive the largest spending increase of all media in the 1992 and 1993 model years, according to the Power survey, conducted exclusively for Advertising Age and Automotive News.

Because "Texas is a huge market for Suburbans," regional Lintas:Campbell-Ewald ads hail it as "the national car of Texas."

The reliance on spot TV might reflect automakers' desire for flexibility in an uncertain marketplace, says Dick O'Donnell, president of automotive media consultancy O'Donnell Strategy Group.

"In hard times, marketers don't want to make as many long-term commitments," he says. "With spot TV, they don't have to make a buy three or six months ahead, and they can pinpoint customers in specific markets very efficiently."

Automotive advertising typically consists of three tiers: The manufacturer or importer produces national advertising; individual retailers handle their own advertising, usually oriented heavily to price; and somewhere in between, dealers for a particular brand in a given area pool funds, usually with factory help, to create advertising that's usually promotion-oriented and runs on broadcast outlets that most individual dealers can't afford to use.

Variations on how regional ad groups operate have cropped up recently, and in some cases a distinctly separate new tier of regional advertising has begun to appear, as marketers get down to a market-by-market slugfest for share.

'Safety first' ad thinking no longer a crash course

By Joseph Bohn

For decades, the idea that "safety doesn't sell" rang through automotive marketing circles—because safety didn't sell.

Ford Motor Co. unsuccessfully tried marketing "safety packages," including seat belts offered as a $20 option, in the early '60s. In 1974, General Motors Corp. found few takers for its first airbags.

Even as recently as a few years ago, consumers worried about airbags going off accidently or hitting them in the face, says Bob Gillooly, Ford Division car advertising manager.

Today they're prominent in auto ads, as safety has become an integral part of the industry's pitch to a receptive audience of aging baby boomers.

According to the Automotive News/Advertising Age J.D. Power & Associates survey, about 43% of executives at the Big 3 automakers and their agencies say safety messages will become much more important over the next five years.

Asian and European carmakers agree, though not as strongly (25% and 30%, respectively, said it would be much more important).

Safety messages are widespread already. Some examples:

■ Volvo Cars of North America, one of the earliest and strongest safety promoters, quotes a man who attributes his survival of an accident to his wife's Volvo in a TV spot created by Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, New York, part of an extensive campaign. "There are certain moments when your entire world becomes crystal clear," says the advertising.

■ Saturn Corp. also is running an ad via Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, that talks about favorable word-of-mouth publicity from an accident survivor.

■ Toyota Motor Sales USA offers the "43 Best Reasons" for driving a Previa minivan—its conformity to 43 federal car safety standards—in a campaign handled by Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/Pacific, Torrance, Calif.

■ Ford Division is capitalizing on the availability of dual airbags. It features two side-by-side airbags in its ad campaign for Taurus and is also promoting airbag availability in its Econoline and Club Wagon ads.

■ General Motors is focusing on anti-lock brakes. A new low-cost system has enabled GM to put them in 49 of its 57 car and light-truck lines.

Safety is an especially big concern to women, who now buy nearly half of all vehicles, automotive marketers say.

Women relate items like power door locks to safety because "in a bad situation it gives them control. They can make sure all the doors lock quickly," says Karen Ebben, Oldsmobile division director of consumer marketing.

Safety is also more important to older people. Thus, full-size and family cars such as Crown Victoria, Chevrolet Caprice and Olds Ninety Eight and Eighty Eight play it up more extensively than do smaller, sportier models.

But the proliferation of safety messages concerns some automakers.

Chrysler, which standardized airbags on all cars built in the 1990 model year, isn't playing them up as much as it once did because they're no longer as distinguishing. It only promotes them wherever they convey an advantage.

With so many auto manufacturers promoting safety, Volvo last year commissioned its then-new ad agency, Messner Vetere, to find out whether safety should still be its marketing theme.

The research showed safety to be the most important consideration for Volvo buyers, says Bob Austin, director of communications. But it also showed that many non-Volvo buyers believed all cars were equally safe.

That has led the company to fight what Mr. Austin calls "overly simplistic" safety pitches.

Despite its concerns about competitors' safety messages, Volvo is running another campaign that says: "An airbag is only as good as the car it's attached to." □

Ford ads from J. Walter Thompson USA promote side-by-side airbags in Taurus and note Ford's No. 1 position in sales of vehicles with airbags.

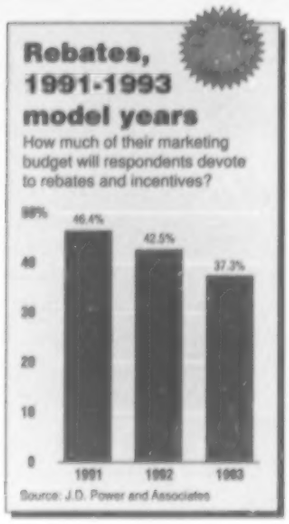
Incentives stay put —at least until the mid-'90s

As carmakers cut costs, that most nagging facet will come under control



By Ariena Sawyers

Automakers want to break away from incentives, but they can't kick the habit.

J.D. Power & Associates found that 77% of auto and agency executives believe incentives will be less important by 1996.

The survey also showed that executives predict a steady decline in dollars allocated to incentives through the 1993 model year.

For the time being, however, the parade of incentives continues. About 90% of the cars and trucks marketed in the U.S. offer incentives averaging $1,498 each, says Suzanne Kinsler, managing director of Autofacts Inc., an automotive information, research and planning consultancy.

Using her figures, the industry spent about $16.5 billion on consumer and dealer incentives last year.

Susan Jacobs, president of Jacobs Automotive, a marketing forecasting and planning agency, attributes the current glut of incentives to the recession and excess production capacity.

But she predicts automakers will be able to move away from incentives by mid-decade.

How? She thinks General Motors Corp.'s plans to eliminate 74,000 jobs, coupled with an expected economic recovery, will mean fewer and less bountiful incentives by the mid-1990s.

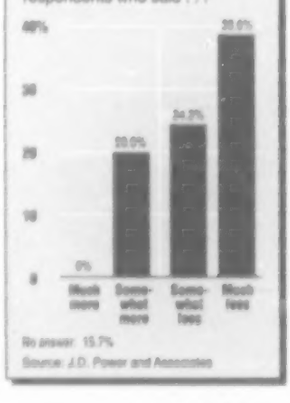
"Incentives readjust prices to market clearing level," Ms. Jacobs says. "By 1994 or 1995, GM's excess capacity will be gone; with a strong recovery that will eliminate blanket incentives. After that, incentives will be more of a tactical move."

Rick Lepley, VP-sales and marketing at Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America, agrees there is no way incentives can remain at current levels.

"When you look at the losses, they can't continue to incentivize at the same levels," he says.

Several automakers already have managed to move away from incentives, while others have disguised them. American Honda Motor Co., for example, offers the least generous incentives among non-luxury car marketers, averaging less than $500 per unit, according to Autofacts.

Volkswagen U.S. got out of the customer rebate business about two years ago and recently started an innovative consumer payment protection program.



Under the program, VW agreed to pay its customers' car and insurance payments for up to a year if they are laid off from their jobs.

Marketing Director David Schembri says he sees an end to "meaningless" incentives, not because of an economic recovery but because consumers see right through them.

He believes value-added incentives will become more popular with marketers in the 1990s.

"Customer rebates are almost an admission that the vehicle is not worth the sticker price," he says. "Consumers are smart, well-read and exposed to the industry. They are seeing through offers that don't have meaning."

Image-conscious importers of European luxury cars seldom offer cash directly to the consumer. Instead, they direct cash to the dealer or offer special cut-rate loans or leases to the consumer.

Detroit's finally learning the hard lessons

Ignore the whining; Big 3 get the hint and are listening to the constituency

By Joseph M. Winski

In this recession—as in the one a decade ago—automakers have emptied their gimmick bags.

They've adopted, cursed, sworn off and again adopted rebates. They've tinkered with warranties and financing deals (less critical this time because interest rates are so much lower).

COMMENTARY

Detroit has again blamed the Japanese for its problems, going so far this time as to send the U.S. president and Big 3 honchos to Tokyo to bash and beg at the same time.

But the sound and fury of the short-term stunts and constant carping obscure what may be the beginnings of fundamental change in the way Detroit markets cars.

Lacking total marketing

Eight decades after Henry Ford told Americans they could have the Model T in any color they wished as long as it was black, U.S. automakers are finally getting it: What the consumer wants does matter.

They're learning this from the masters of understanding the U.S. customer, Japanese carmakers, who have proven to be as savvy at marketing as they are at production.

"There are spots where I see some signs of real improvement" in Detroit's marketing approach, says Laurel Cutler, worldwide director of marketing and planning at Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, and former Chrysler Corp. VP-consumer affairs.

Though the Big 3 together spent $2.65 billion on advertising last year, not to mention rebates and other costly promotions, advertising and promotion are but a small part of total marketing. In the basic sense of marketing, which starts with consideration of the consumer, "Detroit has not marketed at all," Ms. Cutler says.

In addition to producing inferior cars—its most grievous marketing sin—Detroit long had a production/-finance orientation that blinded it to emerging consumer wants, causing it to miss promising market niches. These lapses range from failing to provide quality small cars during the gasoline shortages of the 1970s to ceding much of the luxury car market in the 1980s, first to German companies and then to upscale Japanese models like Toyota Motor Corp.'s Lexus and Honda Motor Co.'s Acura.

The Big 3 insist they're no longer giving marketing short shrift. Like the best Japanese companies, the Big 3 say, they're integrating marketing into the product development process early on and listening to what marketers and consumers have to say every step of the way.

Chrysler, which last year suffered the embarrassment of dropping to fifth in U.S. car sales behind Honda and Toyota, is making the most public proclamations of reform.

In ad spreads signed by Chairman Lee Iacocca, the company boasts it has done nothing less than "reinvent" the way it makes cars. "And what drives the system is the voice of the customer," the ad claims.

■ Power survey respondents rate Toyota tops in marketing—Page S-14.
■ GM's massive remodeling and how marketing fits in—Page S-24.

Fewer oohs-and-aahs

That represents a sea change for Detroit. It has been practically a U.S. automaker tradition to build the cars they wanted and complacently stand back to watch consumers ooh-and-aah at the annual new-model debuts.

Early attempts by the Japanese to crack the market, such as Toyota with its dismal Toyopet in the 1950s, only heightened Detroit's sense of invulnerability.

But as Philip Kotler, Northwestern University marketing professor, has documented in his 1985 book, "The New Competition," Toyota was learning from its mistakes.

Encouraged by the Japanese government, which singled out automobiles as one way to build a strong export-based economy, Toyota spotted room for well-made, reliable small cars. When the 1974 Arab oil embargo hit, Toyota—and to a lesser extent Honda and Nissan Motor Co.—were ready to please a market suddenly clamoring for good, fuel-efficient vehicles.

Detroit, stuck with acres of big cars it couldn't sell, shrugged. Pure luck, it said of the Japanese suc-

Dartboard dealin' hits target

By Arlena Sawyers

Even as they vow to move away from incentives, automakers are constantly looking for ways to strengthen their programs so they stand out from the crowd.

Several car companies have found some marketing muscle in regional incentives.

Among them is Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America, which largely shuns national incentives. Rick Lepley, VP-sales and marketing, says the company leaves most incentive decisions to its five regional managers because they know their markets better than anyone else.

For instance, Mitsubishi's Northeast region often puts its most generous incentives on Galant, popular with lower-middle-income buyers in that area. The Southeast and Southwest regions usually put their incentive might behind pickups, which are favorites in those areas.

To attract a certain kind of customer, many manufacturers offer narrowly defined discounts as well.

General Motors Corp., for example, offers $400 rebates to military personnel and military spouses who buy or lease eligible GM cars and trucks. A Buick ad in the October/November issue of Modern Maturity included a coupon worth $400 off the price of any Buick to consumers age 50 and older.

In addition, automakers often offer a special discount to their own customers or owners of competitive models. Earlier this year, owners of Ford Motor Co. vehicles were eligible for $1,000 rebates if they purchased certain full-size models.

But not every incentive comes in the form of cash.

Subaru of America took some money it used to spend on incentives and added extra standard equipment to its 1992 Legacy. The least expensive 1992 Legacy, $12,999 with a $500 built-in rebate, now has power windows and locks, air conditioning and a stereo cassette player as standard. That makes the 1992 model $1,420 less expensive than a similarly equipped 1991 model.

Mazda Motor of America is running a similar program. It offers a $1,000 rebate plus either free air conditioning or free automatic transmission on 1992 Protege, 626 and MX-6 cars.

Chris Wackman, Subaru VP-marketing, says such programs give consumers value for their money.

"The customer feels that he's buying value, not just the best rebate," says Mr. Wackman. □

Incentives

Cars and Jaguar Cars disguised incentives as offers to pay the luxury tax.

Importers of Audi, Saab and Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti division give their customers a break with cut-rate leasing. Such deals often cover all scheduled maintenance, all for less than a regular loan payment.

There are even signs that the biggest sellers are struggling to move away from customer rebates, too.

In February, Ford Motor Co. and Chevrolet reduced incentives on some models. These don't quite signal the demise of Detroit's addiction to incentives, but at least automakers are trying. □

Who did that ad?

The young copywriters behind the agency wheels of some hot cars.

The blatant "subliminal" ad touch carried off the dual personality of the Toyota Paseo.

Writer sporty —and practical

Leisa Odom is having fun in the male-dominated world of automobile advertising.

The 30-year-old copywriter at Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/Pacific, Torrance, Calif., scoffs at the notion that guys are more mechanical and better suited to complex issues like the internal combustion engine.

"That's crap. I grew up on a farm. Go to my house and see who rewires the electrical sockets and hooks up the VCR. I do, my boyfriend doesn't."

She knows her way around a car, too. "I grew up changing my own oil. I can change a flat and I can do that kind of stuff. I wouldn't say I'm a buff, but I certainly can get by and I drive a sports car."

Odom

Being female hasn't held her back while working on Saatchi's Toyota account. "I don't let that interfere. It's not a plus or a minus either. If you get the best idea, the best person wins," she says.

Ms. Odom was the writer on the campaign that used an edge of subliminal advertising to introduce the Paseo as both a practical and sporty little car.

"It was a wonderful opportunity with the launch," she says. "We had to create a personality for this car and it was a perfect demographic for an irreverent tonality. And we did that. I think it's been very successful in positioning the car."

The TV commercials have been well received, and one of the spots won a Mobius award from the U.S. Festivals Association.

"My head has swollen up a lot since the Paseo [campaign broke]. It's made me feel great because some of the comments I've gotten have been unsolicited. I had a couple of people walk up to me in the gym. They knew I worked in advertising and they asked if I'd seen the new Paseo stuff. They didn't know that I wrote it."

Now she's hooked on car advertising.

She applied for work on the Toyota account about a year ago, while working in Saatchi's New York office.

"I wanted to get a wide body of work. I always thought cars would be kind of hard, but fun, too. I came out [to California] for six months and liked it so much I begged to stay. I chained myself to my furniture and they said OK." □

Toyota takes a bow in survey

Attention to basics and ability to follow through wins competitor admiration

By Cleveland Horton

It's hard to quibble with success.

When asked to identify the most outstanding automotive marketer, most automaker and agency executives name Toyota Motor Sales USA.

The leading Asian importer received top marks in four of five specific marketing areas, according to the exclusive J.D. Power & Associates survey conducted for Automotive News and Advertising Age.

Those marks represent a surprising consensus in the highly competitive industry. Survey respondents couldn't nominate their own or their client's brand.

Industry envy

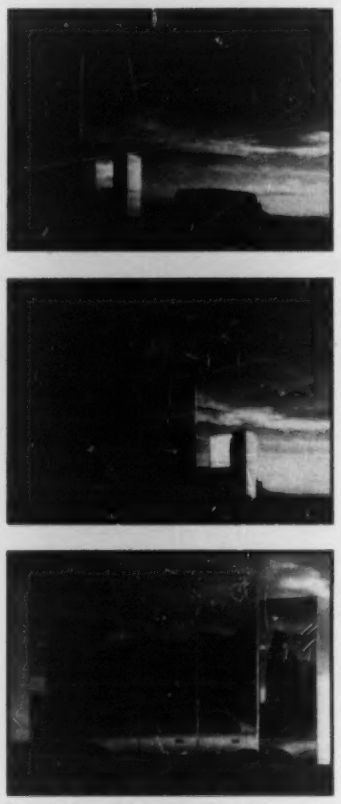
The results highlight the auto industry's envy of Toyota's formidable marketing machine. Additionally, Toyota's Lexus division was named No. 1 in terms of creative (see chart below) and No. 2 behind Toyota in its use of media and promotions.

Toyota's advertising is handled by Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/Pacific, Torrance, Calif., while the advertising for Lexus is from Team One, El Segundo, Calif., a Saatchi subsidiary created to handle the new division.

Agency consistency could be one factor in Toyota's high rating; the Japanese import basically has had but two ad agencies since its U.S. introduction in 1958. Its first agency was Clinton E. Frank Inc., a Chicago-based agency, and the account was moved to the larger Dancer-Fitzgerald-Sample in 1975. Dancer was acquired by London-based Saatchi in 1986 and soon merged with Compton Advertising under the Saatchi name.

Toyota "overall has as much marketing [staff] as does Ford or Chrysler," says George Peterson, president, AutoPacific Group, a consultancy.

"They are the Philip Morris of the automotive industry," says Larry Postaer, principal and exec VP-creative director, Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, agency for American Honda Motor Co.



Toyota is putting massive advertising support behind its Camry midsize sedan, devoting $120 million to push the car.

Models linked

But unlike the cigarette and package-goods marketer, Mr. Postaer adds, Toyota links many of its vehicles to a single brand.

"Because their truck and car [advertising] is so tied together, unlike anyone else, they benefit strongly from that. They're omnipresent."

High awareness

Indeed, Toyota's "I love what you do for me" tagline, used for both cars and trucks and now going into its third year, led to high awareness and "the whole mystique of the brand," says Bill Hagelstein, exec VP-general manager, Foote, Cone & Belding, Santa Ana, Calif., which handles Mazda Motor of America.

While most automotive marketers have focused on saving money during the current recession, Toyota has been able to dig deep into the pockets of its corporate parent to make sure every aspect of a marketing program is covered.

"From everything we can tell," Mr. Peterson says, "they have determined what the attributes are to do very solid marketing programs for their product . . . When they decide to market a car, they check all the boxes. If something is necessary, they'll invest to make sure that that happens."

In the area of promotions, Toyota is aggressive in its "sale-a-thons," supporting them with heavy advertising as well as enticing rebates.

In the Power survey, auto executives named Toyota No.

Shops better look over their shoulders

Expect six auto account reviews in two years: Survey

By Jon Lafayette

Ad agencies looking for a car account should keep their motors running.

The J.D. Power & Associates survey conducted for Automotive News and Advertising Age shows 14.3% of auto executives said an agency review is very likely within the next two years.

Another 7.1% said a review is somewhat likely, leaving 62.9% very unlikely and 11.4% somewhat unlikely to have a review. The remaining 4.3% had no answer.

While 7.1% and 11.4% might seem small, the percentages are significant because they indicate six of the roughly 30 major automobile ad accounts in the U.S. could be up for review in the next two years.

More musical chairs

That would rival the wheel-spinning pace with which carmakers have been playing musical chairs with ad agencies over the past year.

During that time, Subaru of America moved from Levine, Huntley, Vick & Beaver, New York, to Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore.; American Isuzu Motors went from Della Femina, McNamee, Los Angeles, to Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco; Volvo Cars of North America from Scali, McCabe, Sloves to Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, both New York; and Mercedes-Benz of North America drove to Scali, McCabe, Sloves from McCaffrey & McCall, also New York.

These changes represent the shift of about $270 million in car ad billings. That's a lot of hubcaps.

Since the survey was done, Jaguar Cars put its $15 million-to-$20 million account up for review. Yugo America was already in the process of selecting a new agency, and Kia, a Korean carmaker, is looking for a shop to introduce its products to the U.S.

No room for security

As the auto industry struggles with the recession, it's not surprising so many agencies have lost auto accounts. And since the economy still hasn't picked up, the agencies that survived 1991 shouldn't feel too secure.

Ad agency executives think imports are the most likely car accounts to go up for review in the next year. BMW of North America and Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti division are among the marques most frequently mentioned, either because of poor results in the marketplace or instability at the agency.

But the big money is in Detroit. Some agency executives believe domestic automakers ought to shake up their agencies, but they aren't so sure the stranglehold longtime Detroit shops have on the business can be broken.

Old imagery powers old perceptions of Detroit cars

Imports' cadre of upstart shops wins fans by challenging the usual tricks

HONDA: With its simple, eye-catching imagery—produced with prodigious but utterly invisible technological virtuosity—Honda TV advertising has become not only a sales tool but also a metaphor for Honda automobiles. Rubin Postaer & Associates, Santa Monica.

SUBARU: Subaru, resurrecting the irreverence, self-deprecation, non-ostentation appeal and typeface of Doyle Dane Bernbach's Volkswagen ads of the early '60s, goes against auto-ad convention by deglamorizing its cars. The psychographic target: the conspicuously inconspicuous consumer. Wieden & Kennedy, Cherry Hill, N.J.

By Bob Garfield
"Ad Review" columnist

Chrysler Corp. gets a lot of attention for its various corporate campaigns ("Hi, I'm Lee Iacocca. Buy a Chrysler product or one of these distinguished top executives dies at dawn").

But what viewers are most apt to have seen lately has nothing to do with impassioned chief-executive pleading, nor with airbag safety, nor with the long-awaited coming of the Viper.

What viewers see the most is three babes in tight, red sequins, kicking and grinding for Dodge.

Oy.

It's a promotion campaign from BBDO Worldwide, Southfield, designed to generate traffic in empty Dodge showrooms. And it must be working like crazy. Chrysler only lost $795 million in 1991.

This isn't entirely coincidental. While American cars have substantially closed the quality gap with the Japanese competition, American-car advertising still clings to the old themes (sex appeal, prestige, excitement), the old imagery (mountain roads at dusk), the old bombast ("THE BEST BUILT, BEST BACKED american CAR!"), the old superficiality ("The Heartbeat of America").

Is it any wonder, then, that consumers cling to their prejudices about American cars?

The Japanese, on the other hand, have mainly aligned themselves with the New Advertising as created by such upstart agencies as Chiat/Day/-Mojo (Nissan); Rubin Postaer & Associates (Honda); Wieden & Kennedy (Subaru); Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein (Isuzu); and Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos (Infiniti).

Japan, on the other hand, is gaining share. This is no coincidence, either.

When Chiat/Day/Mojo took on the Nissan business in 1987, many asked if this really boded any fundamental change vs. an experiment in self-indulgent creative that would soon give way to the tried-and-true.

At first there was no clear answer. Chiat/Day/Mojo's premiere effort was the insufferable Yuppies in a Hangar campaign, featuring eight demographically balanced refugees from "thirtysomething," lounging around in very dramatic lighting and congratulating one another for their surpassing vision in creating the Nissan Pathfinder.

Mercifully, this turned out to be an anomaly. Since then, in various bold and subtle ways, Chiat and its fellow travelers have challenged every assumption, every canon, every cliche Detroit ever had about advertising cars.

In their place: wit, self-deprecation, simplicity of image, humility, directness, accessibility and an unorthodox approach to consumer psychology.

Chiat pitched Nissans to Joe Sixpack by stimulating not sex fantasies but empowerment fantasies.

Wieden & Kennedy ridiculed the notion of buying a car to impress the neighbors and (echoing the Volkswagen ads from the once upstart Doyle Dane Bernbach) promoted a sort of conspicuously inconspicuous consumption. Hill Holliday had the temerity, widely viewed as sacrilege, to produce car commercials minus any cars whatsoever.

And for Saturn, Hal Riney & Partners said, "Aw shucks. We Saturn folks aren't anythin' special. We're just a buncha folks who really care about makin' a pretty fair country car, and we hope you think it's a pretty fair car, too."

All right, granted, Saturn isn't a Japanese car. But it's General Motors' version of a Japanese car, mimicking the Asians in styling, performance, management techniques and integrated design.

Chiat pitched Nissans by stimulating empowerment fantasies.

It's therefore also no coincidence that Saturn, along the way of being "A Different Kind of Car, A Different Kind of Company," had to find itself a different kind of agency—i.e., not McCann-Erickson, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, N W Ayer or Lintas:Campbell-Ewald.

Not all of these approaches are necessarily unassailable. Infinti's "rocks and trees" spots were as annoying as they were intriguing, and Riney's early Saturn ads were too laid back, ostentatiously—and therefore falsely—humble.

Moreover, Toyota hired Saatchi & Saatchi, formerly Dancer-Fitzgerald-Sample, a large, establishment shop producing monumentally bland advertising, and Toyota is the gorilla of imports.

If the domestic car industry is to prosper—as it will, when its astonishingly good new products come on line and the American consumer's predisposition to associate "quality" with "Japanese" begins to wane—the advertising lessons are clear: Babes and jingles may please the senses, but what they communicate is a legacy that is best forgotten. □

SATURN: What if someone could build a Japanese car with American values? This is what Saturn is all about and Hal Riney & Partners has pretty well communicated it, too, with a series of ultra-self-effacing spots about some country folks who hug their kids and go to church and make the best darn family cars they can, no matter how hard they work to get the job done. The humility is sometimes excessive, but the message comes through.

ISUZU TROOPER: Despite their generally out-of-sync quality, new spots from Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein for the Isuzu Trooper cleverly invoke wry universal truths—such as men's macho inability to ask for directions—to highlight the advantages of four-wheel drive.

Easy to covet, hard to connect

By Joe Mandese

With the possible exception of the recession, no story dominates the conversations of automotive media planners and buyers more than cross-media deals.

Cross-media packages appear to combine many of the hottest marketing buzzwords: integrated marketing, value-added, synergy.

But beneath the hyperbole, only a handful of such deals have actually been structured, including three separate Time Warner megadeals with General Motors Corp., Chrysler Corp. and Mazda Motor of America.

Even the people involved in the most intimate details of those deals say the jury is out on their value.

Cross-media packages tend to be open-ended and multi-year arrangements that require constant stewardship and fine-tuning. Thus, many executives involved in them say it is difficult to specify exactly what they've gotten at any point in time.

"These are moving, breathing things," says James Helberg, VP-group media director at Foote, Cone & Belding, Santa Ana, Calif., who helped develop and continues to rewrite Mazda's cross-media package with Time Warner.

While he maintains Mazda is getting good value out of the buy, he says many cross-media deals are more statement than substance.

"There's a lot of pressure on agencies and clients to create the next big idea. And cross-media is the next big idea," he says.

"A lot of them have been done for grandstanding reasons. I think a lot of them that were announced have not come to fruition," admits Phil Guarascio, GM's executive-in-charge of corporate marketing and advertising.

"Most of the advertisers are making agreements in concept and working a lot of the specifics out as they walk through together," adds Randy Schroeder, exec VP-management director/media for Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Southfield, Mich., which handles Chrysler's Jeep/-Eagle division. "Time Warner and others have a massive array of potential outlets. We've got to get smarter on how to use them."

In GM's Time Warner deal, Mr. Guarascio says the auto marketer has the capability of using "35 or 40 different kinds of applications of non-mainline media" that Time Warner has to offer.

To date, he says, GM has implemented about a dozen.

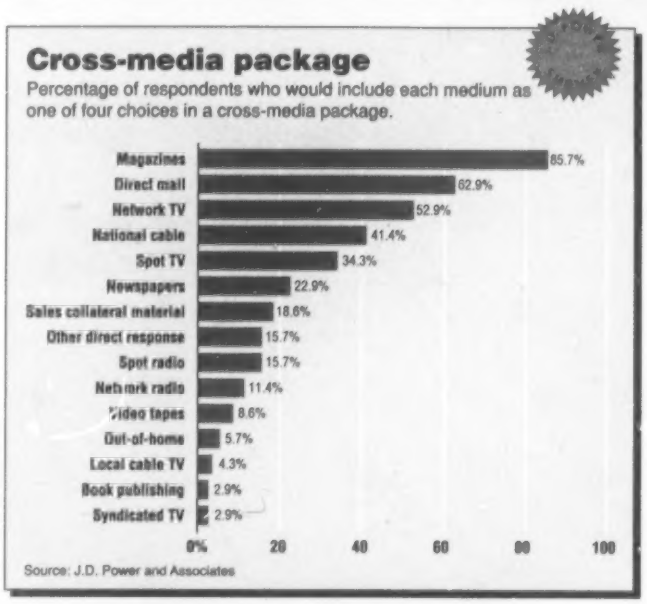
He declined to be specific about which programs GM has used. But Mr. Guarascio notes GM has used video production, graphic arts and fulfillment capabilities, and it has married that to in-magazine targeting capabilities of the company.

"It takes a tremendous amount of energy to make these things work. We're really looking for ways to combine a variety of elements to create a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts," Mr. Guarascio says.

Most auto media executives believe use of cross-media will grow, but not necessarily on the magnitude of the multimillion-dollar megadeals.

"I think you'll continue to see multiple-media deals, but they will end up being much more specifically customized in the future," says Mr. Schroeder. "Five years from now, you're going to have very small specific proposals that are multi-media and highly targeted toward the client, but not necessarily the same singular great buy." □

Raymond Serafin contributed to this story.



Magazines linchpin of cross-media

Most auto marketers say they aren't looking for cross-media deals to be all-inclusive.

The J.D. Power & Associates survey found 85.7% of respondents cited magazines as one of four media elements they would include in an ideal cross-media package, while 62.9% cited direct mail, 52.9% network TV and 41.4% cable TV.

Spot TV, newspapers and sales collateral materials were less popular choices with 34.3%, 22.9% and 18.6% of respondents citing those options, respectively. Interestingly, the value of the respective media in cross-media deals varies between agency and advertiser executives.

Asked to design the "ideal" cross-media package, network and spot TV were components cited by 97.3% of automotive ad agency executives, but only 75.8% of auto marketing executives.

In contrast, 87.8% of automaker personnel were more inclined than agency respondents (70.3%) to include direct mail/-direct response media.

Overall, 31.4% cited the lower costs-per-thousand that cross-media deals can generate as the primary advantage of such deals, and 27.1% cited the ability to deliver a single message in a variety of media.

Such findings suggest the cross-media deals have been primarily designed as large-volume discount programs combined with value-added options.

As a result, some agency media executives believe the deals have been used more for tactical reasons than strategic ones.

"From my perspective I would want to look at a cross-media promotion as a relevant marketing idea that would have extensions of the communications value first," says Bob Mancini, senior VP-media director of J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, agency for Ford Motor Co.'s Ford Division.

To some agency media executives, price efficiency is the operative term, and important as one component of overall strategy.

No panacea

Price is "important insofar as you don't want to put yourself in the position of spending more per impression than you would otherwise," says Joel Kushins, senior VP-media director at Bozell, New York, agency for Chrysler Corp. "But unless there is something compelling about what the whole package deal is about, it's probably not worth doing."

Mr. Kushins says today's cross-media deals will lead to better ones in the future.

"Cross-media is not the ultimate panacea," he says, "but it's gotten people on the agency, client and media side doing things and thinking about things that they would not have even considered doing before." □

The General preps for the counterattack

Inserting the team approach tops changes needed to rebound from '80s

By Raymond Serafin

There's not much wrong with General Motors Corp. that an infusion of good marketing can't fix, to hear some marketers tell it.

But this marketing sensibility needs to find its way into the marrow of the entire company, not just be restricted to the ghettos of designated marketing units.

What's needed is something Vincent Barabba calls " 'Big M' Marketing," to distinguish it, he says, from the narrower activities taken on by "the people who have marketing in their titles."

> "If I can recognize a car at 1,000 feet, that's an identity."

Mr. Barabba is executive-in-charge of GM's market research decision center and—some observers say—a missionary of sorts, preaching that corporate salvation can be found in being a marketing-driven company.

Create a customer

Mr. Barabba hearkens back to management authority Peter Drucker's admonition that the purpose of any business is to create a customer. In Mr. Barabba's broad view, marketing encompasses multidepartmental planning and executing of product development, pricing, promotion and distribution to attract customers and sustain a relationship with them.

"Change is difficult, particularly when you've been a dominant player in your industry," says Mr. Barabba. "It's unfortunate, but sometimes it takes a level of pain to say you're going to have to change the way you do business."

The question of how to produce a GM comeback would never have arisen if the giant company had been taking better care of its customer base over the last decade. GM lost customers in droves during the 1980s, and that has colored the way the world views the entire U.S. domestic automobile industry.

Share drops 11

From 1980 to 1990, the domestics' share of U.S. car market registrations dropped 6 share points, to 65.7%. GM lost 11 share points in that time, to 35.4% from 46.4%.

That drop of 11 share points coincided with the tenure of Roger Smith as chairman of GM. Robert Stempel succeeded Mr. Smith on Aug. 1, 1990, the day before Iraq invaded Kuwait, setting into motion events that aggravated the economic downturn.

"I put Stempel and Boris Yeltsin in the same category," says Jim Wangers, senior managing partner of Automotive Marketing Consultants. Both men are trying to hold together the remnants of an empire nearly ruined by their predecessors.

"GM might never recover from Roger Smith, but Stempel is catching most of the hell," Mr. Wangers says.

Mr. Stempel presides over a company that lost $4.5 billion in 1991, the biggest loss posted by any company ever. GM is now planning to close 21 plants over the next three years as part of an effort to control costs.

Shortcomings showed

"Marketing," says Mr. Wangers, "has been one of the serious shortcomings of the corporation over the last decade or so."

Led by Mr. Stempel and President Lloyd Reuss, GM is reorganizing, creating a North American Operations group to eliminate layers of management and develop improved accountability for decisions.

Mr. Barabba describes the goal for the new organization as "a seamless structure . . . running the business from the market's point of view."

Traditionally within GM, separate units plan aspects such as product, pricing, distribution and promotion, leading to the creation of mini-empires. "They bring all these optimized business plans together and then begin compromising, and you get giant fights taking place" as departments battle over turf, Mr. Barabba says.

In place of that system, GM envisions an organization in which multidisciplined groups work as teams to find strategies keyed to sustaining customer satisfaction and delegate the resources needed to accomplish the goal.

A key point is the focus on customer relationships rather than selling a vehicle.

"I might make decisions that re-

On edge in the middle of America

'People in the Rust Belt tend to become emotional when you talk about imports'

By Patricia Strnad

When Toyota Motor Corp. started building cars in Georgetown, Ky., dealers of domestic autos in the area complained bitterly.

The plant's presence was killing their sales, says Jay Houghton, principal in charge of research and consulting at Automotive Information Group. At the time, Mr. Houghton was senior VP at Lintas: Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., in charge of advertising in the central region for General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet Division.

■ A look at other U.S. regions on Pages S-26, S-50 and S-51.

The potential to capture sales from domestic brands is one of the main reasons Japanese automakers built plants in the Midwest.

"One of the reasons Honda chose to build cars in Marysville, Ohio . . . wasn't that Marysville has natural resources or great distribution advantages," Mr. Houghton says. "The reasoning was, if people in that area worked on those products, they would buy those products."

Tough to crack

Now most Japanese automakers operate plants in the Midwest, which has been the toughest sales region for them to crack. In addition to the Kentucky and Ohio plants of Toyota and Honda Motor Co., respectively, Nissan Motor Co. builds vehicles in Smyrna, Tenn.; Mazda Motor Corp. has a plant in Flat Rock, Mich.; Mitsubishi Motors Corp. operates a plant in Normal, Ill.; and Fuji Heavy Industries (maker of Subaru) and Isuzu Motors have a manufacturing joint venture in Lafayette, Ind.

Although those plants have improved consumer acceptance of Japanese vehicles, most Japanese importers are finding it necessary to adopt other strategies to boost sales in America's heartland.

Among the tactics: Strengthening distribution via added dealerships, increasing area media weight and creating ads aimed directly at Midwesterners, who tend to be more loyal to General Motors, Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp.

In recent months Japanese automakers have increased advertising in the Midwest to fight anti-Japanese sentiment triggered by recession, GM plant closings and layoffs, and widespread media attention on the trade imbalance. And many have turned to advertising that emphasizes the U.S. origins of many of their products.

Share lags

It's too early to tell whether the increased marketing activity is helping. But even before hostility toward Japanese products began to escalate, the Japanese cars' Midwest market share lagged significantly behind national share.

According to R.L. Polk & Co., which tracks U.S. vehicle registrations, domestic brands took a 64.1% share of total U.S. new car registrations in 1991, compared with 31.5% for Japanese brands. But in the Midwest, domestic nameplates took 75.7% to the Japanese 21.7% share.

"Market acceptance of Japanese brands depends on whether there's a strong support for the union in that town," says Rick Lepley, senior VP-sales and marketing for

Calif. dream turns urgent

By Cleveland Horton

California or bust.

That's the rallying cry from Detroit as domestic car marketers gear up to retake market share in the heart of import country.

Although specialized automobile marketing programs for the California market have come and gone, the nature of the most recent efforts resembles a clutch play.

Domestic automakers are joining the battle as if their survival depends on it. And it might.

Big percentage

Apart from its acknowledged role as bellwether for the nation, California traditionally accounts for 11% of all U.S. sales of cars and light trucks.

For 1991, however, California sales for the Big 3 fell far below that, compared with total U.S. sales. General Motors Corp.'s sales in the state represented 9.3% of its total U.S. volume. Chrysler did 9.2% of its U.S. volume in the Golden State while Ford's percentage came in at 8.5%.

By contrast, the Asian imports counted on California for 17.3% of their U.S. sales; European imports saw 21.0% of their sales in the state.

Evidence of the new commitment by the domestics to California is rife. GM took the unprecedented step by bringing all its divisions together late last year to discuss corporate action in retaking the California market.

Sources say Ford Motor Co. is holding top-level meetings addressing not only product concerns regarding its California share but ways of making it "O.K." for West Coast people to park a Ford in their driveway.

"California has always been a problem—or an opportunity—for the domestics," says Vic Olesen, president of Vic Olesen & Partners, Los Angeles, which handled West Coast advertising for Chevrolet until early this year.

Opportunity cars

"The hard part is getting the company to swallow the fact that they cannot sell Caprices here but they can Camaros," Mr. Olesen says. "They have to identify volume, opportunity cars."

Chevy's national agency, Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich, recently expanded its Los Angeles office to oversee the division's western regional work. But Richard O'Connor, chairman-ceo, agrees with Mr. Olesen's assessment.

"California has traditionally been a great Camaro market, but there hasn't been a redesign of that car in 11 years," he says.

And then there's Saturn. GM's $3 billion experiment represents the company's last, best hope in fighting the imports, and the new division zeroed in early on the importance of California.

To win back import owners, Saturn hired a San Francisco agency, Hal Riney & Partners, which created a teaser campaign introducing the company, rather than the car, in October 1990. GM's new star first became available in California.

Chrysler Corp. also did "the most comprehensive research the company has ever done," says John Damoose, VP-marketing, when the company "went to California and talked to thousands of import buyers."

One of the things they learned, Mr. Damoose says, was that just changing the vehicles alone wasn't enough; the company needed to change its way of dealing with customers. So Chrysler now is launching what Mr. Damoose believes to be the most ambitious dealer training program ever. □

Home field advantage?

Japanese car marketers' success in taking almost half of the California market didn't happen by accident.

First, most located their U.S. marketing arms in California: Toyota Motor Sales USA, American Honda Motor Co., Nissan Motor Corp. USA, American Isuzu Motors, Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America, American Suzuki Motor Corp. and Mazda Motor of America.

Then, they designed cars specifically for the state, adding standard features such as FM radios (the California FM market was more developed in the 1970s than the rest of the country).

"People got some satisfaction out of those Japanese products," says Jim Wangers, senior marketing partner at Automotive Marketing Consultants. "And then the Japanese improved the areas where they were originally weak, like styling."

It worked. "Part of being a Californian is to drive a Japanese car," he says. □

Who did that ad?

The young copywriters behind the agency wheels of some hot cars.

"Dullsville's" mix of laid-back scenes helped put the NX on the map for Nissan and agency Chiat/Day/Mojo.

Putting cool into 'Dullsville'

People ask Rob Siltanen if he can help them buy a new Nissan NX cheap.

"I can't get them cheap. I can't even get one for myself," says the 28-year-old copywriter who worked on the "Dullsville" spot at Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif.

Even after finding out there's no special discount available for acquaintances of the copywriter, "everybody always says those are really cool commercials," Mr. Siltanen says. The strategy was to position the NX as a fun car. "It's the kind of car my friends would want to drive. I think we succeeded in saying it's a fun car. We didn't have to get into all those other things, like how well it handles."

For Rob Siltanen, "a car has always been an emotional thing, more than a rational thing."

Mr. Siltanen worked on the Acura account at Ketchum Advertising, Los Angeles, before joining Chiat/Day/Mojo a year and a half ago. And he didn't move onto the Nissan account right away.

"I was working on everything non-Nissan and this project came up and my partner and I jumped in," he says.

At the time, there wasn't much competition. "When I first got there, a lot of people wanted to be on the other [non-Nissan] side," he says. Now everybody wants to work on the Nissan account, because the work's so good. They give us a lot of opportunities to do the kind of work we want to do."

Mr. Siltanen says he never thought of himself as a car buff.

"For me, a car has always been an emotional thing, more than a rational thing. Now I'm starting to see some of the rational reasons that are real. You just have to drive the cars to see," he says. "I'm learning the language—'viscous limited slip differential' and all that stuff."

He recently visited Nissan's plant in Smyrna, Tenn., to help round out his auto education. "I'm just now starting to appreciate them a little bit more, especially working with so many 'car guys.' I won't call myself that yet. I'm learning." □

Compensation misses mark

Several consumer products companies in the U.S. have started using an incentive pay structure for ad agencies —in effect, paying more if the advertising "works."

Such large package-goods marketers as Campbell Soup Co., RJR Nabisco and Kraft General Foods have adopted a form of incentive-based compensation in the past few years.

But automakers aren't fazed by the compensation trend. The J.D. Power & Associates survey for Advertising Age and Automotive News found that fewer than one-fifth of the respondents (18.6%) use any performance criteria as a portion of agency compensation.

Sixty percent report they don't foresee basing agency pay on performance in the near future. □ thinks a new wave of activity could sweep him in.

"Detroit is taking another look at itself in every way. They can't afford to have the Japanese beat them in advertising," he says. "They're working very hard to catch up and overrun the Japanese in car design and car quality, and all of that is going to be meaningless if they can't market their cars as good as the Japanese have."

Adds Don Weir, exec VP-account services at Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York, "there's no question that good advertising could help those guys."

Jordan McGrath has been trying to get a car account for years. Mr. Weir thinks Detroit could certainly use some new blood.

Consumers are numbed

"It would make a hell of a lot of sense. They've been doing the same old stuff for so long that there's just a staggering, numbing effect on consumers," he says.

"They spend billions a year on advertising automobiles. Out of that about half is spent in deals, sale-athons, price-off promotion, rebates, zero financing. It's just unbelieveably numbing."

The problem runs deeper than creative execution, Mr. Weir says.

"It's their positioning work, their strategies. There was a day when Pontiac had 'We Build Excitement' and their cars echoed that all the way down to the accelerator floor. The advertising grew out of that. Now consumers are having a real hard time telling the difference between Pontiacs and Oldsmobiles, Buicks and Chevrolets. There's no delineation. That's a strategic problem as much as a creative problem."

But Mr. Weir thinks getting a domestic auto account is a long shot for his agency. "That's such a hard club and clique to break into," he says.

"The relationships are just so layered into each other—they go back 50 years," adds Donnie Deutsch, exec VP-creative director at Deutsch, New York. "But we all know they should be looking. Just look at the Saturn advertising that [Hal Riney & Partners] did. You can poke holes and say that's just more Riney, but it has a voice. It's advertising. Most of the other car advertising is pap," he says.

If automakers decide to go shopping for a new agency, they'll find it tough to find many substantial shops that don't already have a car account.

"There aren't that many stores in town," says Mr. Della Femina. "The same people will be called for the next major Detroit thing. It will be us, it'll be Jordan Case, it'll be maybe Bill Tragos [chairman of TBWA].

"There are agencies without car accounts that are sitting in nice seats right now and can probably pick up a good one if Detroit starts to move. And let's face it. If one of the Big 3 in Detroit makes a move, the other two are not going to sit back and let them." □

All signals look green

Environment concerns move to front, auto execs agree

By Arlena Sawyers

Green marketing could turn golden in the auto industry.

Decades of growing environmental awareness and deteriorating air quality have led to stringent clean-air laws that force automobile companies to research, develop and test-market environmentally friendlier vehicles.

And that looks to be playing right into growing grassroots consumer interest in the issue.

Importance grows

The J.D. Power & Associates survey for Automotive News and Advertising Age shows green marketing will continue to gain importance with auto executives in the next five years.

Of the automaker and agency executives surveyed, 20% said green marketing will become much more important and 70% said it will grow somewhat more important over that time period.

"We spend a lot of time with customers and do a lot of research—awareness of environmental issues is growing," says Richard Fenstermacher, Ford Motor Co. executive director-marketing for North American Automotive Operations.

Most of the green technology—which will include recyclable parts and less toxic materials as well as cleaner exhausts—is still in the concept-vehicle stage. That means most green marketing is limited to news stories, displays at auto shows and carefully monitored pilot programs.

> "While [alternative] fuels have positive attributes, there are some trade-offs."

The state of California is the driving force in auto industry greenness, with the toughest clean-air standards in the country.

In September 1990, the California Air Resources Board adopted a law that, beginning in 1998, requires 2% of each automaker's sales have zero emissions. With existing technology, that means battery power. The portion rises to 10% in 2003.

As many as nine states and the District of Columbia have signed agreements supporting similar rules in their jurisdictions. Together, those states represent one-third of U.S. car and light-truck registrations.

Nearly every manufacturer has developed or is developing an electric vehicle (see story below) but they're not considered practical yet.

Build a better battery

At this stage of development, the vehicles have short driving ranges and batteries wear out quickly from constantly being recharged.

However, Ford, General Motors Corp. and Chrysler Corp. have a major joint venture under way with a goal of better batteries than those currently available, and all the companies proceed as if they will solve the problems.

Battery power's impact takes hold at GM

First mass-produced electric car cuts across all market segments

By Phil Frame

For General Motors Corp., the successful marketing of a battery-powered vehicle hinges on selling it as a great car that happens to be electric.

In 1998, GM and all other large automakers will be required by California and other states to sell electric or other zero-emission vehicles, whether or not there's a market for such transportation.

GM, the first major automaker to plan to mass produce an electric car, is aiming for a wide audience, says John Albers, director of market research for GM Electric Vehicles, a branch of the advanced engineering staff that developed the company's Impact concept car.

"This is a real car for real customers, and in addition it has an electric propulsion system that gives it more desirability," Mr. Albers says.

"We're trying not to take a look at this car as an unusual product. We ought to think of it as a mainstream product because that's what we want the customer to think."

All "market segments are targets for electric vehicle propulsion. It's not fitting neatly into one segment of the marketplace, which is good for us because that means it has wide appeal," he says.

The sales pitch to customers probably will center on the electric vehicle's environmental benefit, a virtual absence of maintenance and greater convenience because people can "refuel" at home rather than go to a gas station.

The advertising itself is the responsibility of Amy Rader, the 24-year-old director of advertising for GM Electric Vehicles.

Ms. Rader, who worked at Saturn Corp. for 1½ years before taking the job, says the company will focus on educating customers before any media advertising.

"The way I see this working, the education is going to start out teaching people what electric vehicles are, teaching people what questions to ask so they can start comparing," Ms. Rader says. "We have to give consumers a start on how to compare" alternative fuels.

The second step, she says, is to teach people how to realistically look at their driving patterns to see if an electric car is right for them.

"When they stop, how long do they stop? Is it long enough to recharge?" Ms. Rader says. "Getting people to start thinking about their own needs is going to be an important part of our job."

As the vehicle gets closer to production, Ms. Rader's task will be to convince people to buy GM's product.

The other major U.S. automakers are also exploring electric cars, though not at the same level as GM.

Earlier this month, Chrysler Corp. signed an agreement with Westinghouse Electric Corp. to jointly develop an alternating-current motor for a 1995 or 1996 electric minivan.

GM's Impact prototype electric vehicle takes the sloping Saturn nose one step further.

Ford Motor Co. hasn't announced production plans, but it plans to deliver a test fleet of 80 electric minivans based on its European Escort to utility companies in spring '93.

Still, GM's Ms. Rader says: "We have a big competitive advantage because GM's big vertical integration structure is finally paying off. We're the only people who can build our own batteries, converters and sell and service a car."

That advantage might not last too long. Longer-term, the Big 3 have agreed to a joint venture to build by 1994 better batteries than GM can currently produce.

GM's Mr. Albers says he expects the state governments that mandate electric cars to encourage buyers of alternative-fuel vehicles by offering some form of subsidy.

These governments—a number of states have followed California's lead with such rules—adopted the measures to reduce auto emissions and, to have a significant effect, the low-or-zero-emission vehicles have to be on the road in some quantity.

Although GM has begun planning, Mr. Albers knows there may not be great demand for electric vehicles at the moment.

"Right now, I would describe it as market potential," he says. "We need to go out there and raise the level of knowledge and get infrastructure in place. We'll make sure the market is developed when we're ready."

And, he says, GM and the other carmakers can't assure success on their own.

Mr. Albers says utilities and government agencies have to be heavily involved. It will be their eventual job to make sure facilities are available so people can conveniently recharge the electric cars that will follow the coming GM home-rechargable model. □

General counterattacks

duce the amount of value I get from the first [sales] transaction based on the fact I want [the customer] to come back,'' says Mr. Barabba. That might translate into more dealership training or better warranties or other programs.

A more market-based organization could help GM re-establish strong brand images across the board. Mr. Wangers and others say GM's once-powerful brand identities were diluted as a result of Mr. Smith's mid-1980s reorganization, which created three platform groups with responsibility for developing products. The reorganization separated manufacturing and design responsibility from marketing responsibility.

"The secret to rebuilding the brands is to make products that match up with what the brands stand for," says Sean Fitzpatrick, vice chairman of McCann-Erickson North America, which handles Buick, GMC Truck and GM's corporate quality campaign. "If I can recognize a car at 1,000 feet, that's an identity."

Some of GM's brands appear to be on the right track, delivering consistent messages and successful products to match.

Import fighters

Cadillac's 1992 Eldorado and Seville showed the brand could compete with the best of the imports. Buick has boosted its market share in recent years by presenting premium products such as the Park Avenue and LeSabre. Geo has attracted young import prospects.

GMC Truck has been holding its own on the truck front, and the new import-fighting Saturn brand shows promise, based on the high grades it's getting for taking care of customer concerns.

Observers credit Pontiac with developing a performance image, but criticize GM for not providing enough fitting product.

Oldsmobile and, to some extent, Chevrolet remain sore spots.

Olds built big volumes in the mid-1980s with products that appealed to a decidedly mature audience. But with Buick now ensconced successfully in the traditional upscale domestic-car niche, Oldsmobile has floundered in trying to return to a historic identity as a company on the forefront of engineering excellence.

"It's unfortunate, but sometimes it takes a level of pain to say you're going to have to change the way you do business."

Barabba

Chevrolet has been resurgent on the truck side, but it lacks the car that could—given Chevy's vast distribution system—turn into a knockout volume leader.

"Chevrolet should provide GM's entry-level, low-price statement of basic reliable, dependable transportation," says Mr. Wangers. From that standpoint, "GM isn't building a Chevrolet," he says.

Attacking the perception

Beyond putting brand identities in order, GM still faces the problem of convincing once-burned customers this is no longer the haughty organization that put out poor products.

"The difference between GM quality and the highest-quality manufacturers in the world is less than one defect per car," says Philip Guarascio, GM's executive-in-charge of corporate marketing and advertising. "The quality gap has really closed, and we have to make sure people understand that."

It's doubtful any other company matches GM in sheer quantity of research into the market and into marketing communications.

Leading edge

Mr. Guarascio's department has a formalized research and development component devoted to exploring new ways of advertising, merchandising and event marketing.

"Its purpose is to identify long-term leading edge kinds of opportunities that are going to create advantages for our divisions,'' Mr. Guarascio says.

GM in the past several years has been a leader in developing both innovative deals with traditional media organizations and also in exploring new media and promotional opportunities.

Jury's out

The jury is out on whether all of GM's efforts will produce a turnaround, or whether the company will squander its resources. Mr. Barabba says success for GM is a matter of returning to the philosophy that drove Alfred Sloan, the former president and chairman who managed the company to the top of the industry, beginning in the 1920s.

"Sloan had one of the great marketing minds,'' Mr. Barabba says. "He structured a business that had the customer at the end. 'A car for every purse and purpose' [Sloan's maxim]—that's creating a business with the customer at the end.

"We're at the rebirth of how the company is going to do what it did so well before, except now it's going to have to do it in the context of an environment that's a helluva lot harder than what Mr. Sloan started out with." □

Midwest

Mitsubishi. "That's a prevalent factor in forging attitudes. Detroit would certainly be a strong union town, but the union influence isn't quite so strong in a city like Chicago."

Strong job link

It also has to do with the fact that many Midwesterners' jobs are tied to the domestic auto industry.

"People in the Rust Belt tend to become emotional when you start talking about imports and other issues affecting their livelihoods,'' Mr. Houghton says. "They start thinking in terms of black or white. They see the purchase of an import as 'against us.' "

But attitudes and ties to the domestic auto industry aren't the only reasons the Japanese haven't made greater gains in the heartland. Distribution is key, too.

When they first entered the U.S market, Japanese automakers shipped vehicles to ports on the West and East Coasts. With import quotas and a limited supply of vehicles, they naturally began penetrating markets closest to the points of delivery.

"It's taken time to develop strong inland distribution,'' says Jan Thompson, VP-marketing at Mazda.

Adds Bob Weldon, general manager of the Cincinnati region for Toyota Motor Distributors, "It's sheer numbers. In Cincinnati, there are five Toyota dealers compared to about 16 for Ford and 17 or 18 for Chevrolet. That really affects our ability to penetrate the market."

In 1991, there were nearly 7,000 Japanese auto dealerships in the U.S., up 29% from 1987. That's not likely to grow. Mr. Weldon and officials from other Japanese importers say dealer expansion plans are being curbed until the economy improves and existing dealers can strengthen their businesses.

Meanwhile, as the Big 3 urge consumers to "Buy American," Japanese automakers are letting consumers know many of their vehicles are U.S.-made.

Subaru, for example, is putting "Made in America" stickers in the rear windows of the Subaru Legacy, which is built in Indiana and accounts for 70% of Subaru's U.S. sales. The marketer also recently broke a Legacy TV spot shot in the U.S. plant.

Toyota has been running a print campaign this year focusing on the people who work at its Georgetown, Ky., plant and a TV spot talking about the U.S. origin of the Camry sedan. While those ads, from agency Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/Pacific, are running nationwide, "they are played more in the Midwest than on either coast," Mr. Weldon says.

Honda is running two "Made in America'' spots, one for the East and another for the West. A print ad, headlined "What's right with this picture?" shows a right-hand-drive Honda and talks about how Honda exports cars made in the U.S. to Japan. Rubin Postaer & Associates is the agency for Honda.

Flat Rock ad

Mazda broke an ad last month recognizing workers at its Flat Rock, Mich., plant and suppliers for their help in rolling out the redesigned 1993 MX-6 coupe. Copy in that Foote, Cone & Belding ad says the MX-6 is "the first import-branded car that may be truly considered a domestic product." The ad ran in newspapers in the Detroit area and Toledo, Ohio. □

Tradition out the window

troit, last year revised the way they evaluate magazine buys, a process that resulted in Ford reducing its magazine schedule from the previous 130 titles to about 90 for the 1992 model year.

"We buy magazines far more effectively than we used to," says John Vanderzee, Ford's director of advertising. "Today we're using target audience CPM as only one of the factors, albeit an important one.

"We're very interested, for instance, in reader involvement with a magazine. We measure things like how many readers read three out of the last four issues," Mr. Vanderzee says.

Mr. Vanderzee says targeting is easier with magazines than with TV. Ford, he says, had no trouble determining a magazine schedule for its upcoming launch of its redesigned Probe this July.

"But it's not as easy to find youth-oriented television, and also get reach," Mr. Vanderzee says. "MTV reaches youth, but I could buy every commercial on it for a month and not reach one-tenth of the people I want to talk to."

Still role for TV

While the movement toward customizing the message to the audience leaves the TV networks somewhat vulnerable, few auto marketers expect to abandon the medium.

"I don't see it as an either/or situation," says Lois Miller, senior VP-director of media marketing services at Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Marina Del Rey, Calif., agency for Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti. "Mass media perform a certain task, and they do it well, as long as you don't ask mass media to get down to the nitty-gritty selling."

"You have to cover more bases now," says Duncan Pollock, exec VP in charge of BMW of North America at Ammirati & Puris, New York. One reason, he says, is that TV is glutted with auto advertising.

$10 million a night

"We did a study a year and a half ago and found that on an average night in New York City, there is $10 million spent on auto advertising on TV," Mr. Pollock says.

Mr. Vanderzee says clutter is an increasing problem, especially with TV.

"The networks have done a lousy job of controlling it because they need more inventory," Mr. Vanderzee says. "I frankly think they're shooting themselves in the foot, because a lot of people are really tired of it."

That clutter is one factor driving the growth of direct marketing and place-based media, says Mr. Julow, because those options allow a marketer to better control the selling environment.

Chrysler is one of a number of auto marketers that have tried to build a multifaceted marketing program around a particular theme. For instance, the company's involvement with the recent Winter Olympics included broadcast sponsorship on CBS and cross-promotions that involved Kmart Corp., CBS and Time Warner's Sports Illustrated.

Mr. O'Connor says Lintas:Campbell-Ewald believes integrated marketing is the wave of the future.

Three years ago, the agency put together its model for integration in launching the Chevrolet Lumina with multi-media advertising, co-promotion with Walt Disney Co., dealer introduction program and training materials.

Integration builds

Integration is particularly important for durable goods, where dealers and salesmen play a key role in the sale, says Mr. O'Connor.

Marketers such as GM's Cadillac division build a number of their integrated marketing programs around the lifestyles of their affluent target prospects.

"When they are involved in an activity, they tend to be very passionate about it," says Peter Levin, director of advertising for Cadillac.

All this demand to better identify prospective customers calls for additional emphasis on research by marketers and agencies.

"Our research budget has quadrupled in order to fine-tune our marketing," says FCB's Mr. Somerset. "Even after the recession, we aren't going to abandon that."

Mr. Somerset is among those who suggest some media organizations aren't keeping pace with the needs and sophisticated approaches of auto marketers.

Mr. Guarascio says many media organizations' lack of expertise hinders them from forming substantial partnerships with auto marketers.

"Our divisions have talent in the areas of advertising, marketing, merchandising, public relations, sales and event marketing, and we're way ahead of the media in terms of the ability to know how to use those things," he says. "And we don't have the time to educate the media."

For all the recent change in automotive marketing, the next several years may be even more dramatic, says Mr. O'Connor. He sees continued advances in technology making it possible to "start a dialogue with consumers" rather than just put out a message.

Direct contact

He suggests a scenario in which a consumer at home, viewing an auto dealer commercial, will call directly to a salesman who can answer questions and offer to bring over a car for a test drive. Or, a viewer watching a TV commercial might push a button that results in the printing of an invitation and rebate coupon for a test drive at a nearby dealership.

So is this advertising or promotion? For automakers, the answer isn't important, says Mr. O'Connor. "What is important is that you have a seriously qualified prospect to follow up on for a sale."

For the mass media, it's another story entirely. □

Some examples of targeting audiences with niche media:

Videos are big with automakers. Chrysler Corp. and General Motors Corp.'s Pontiac division both used lightweight, relatively inexpensive videocassettes to promote minivans to hundreds of thousands of potential buyers in direct mail campaigns last year.

Chevrolet sent similar tapes for its Corvette to potential buyers.

Chrysler's Dodge Division has three spots from its agency, BBDO Worldwide, Southfield, Mich., on the recent HBO Video production of Sports Illustrated's "Behind the Scenes: The Official Swimsuit Video."

Luxury automakers such as GM's Cadillac division find niche marketing tools can fit their affluent prospects' lifestyles. "They're very active," says Peter Levin, Cadillac's director of advertising. "So it's difficult to catch them using traditional forms of media."

Cadillac will use a 23-minute video as part of the launch of the 1993 Allante, which begins a regional rollout in late April. The video was produced by ADventure, Farmington Hills, Mich.

Saab Cars USA is also using a direct mail video. It is promoting its special 9000 CD Turbo Griffin Edition.

The video, from Saab agency Angotti, Thomas, Hedge, New York, was sent to 50,000 prospects with household incomes of $100,000 or more; names were culled from the subscription rolls of Inc., Money and The Wall Street Journal.

Other than video, Pontiac, Chevrolet and Buick have all committed to test three-sided boards on trucks in the Atlanta area with Patterson's Mobile Media.

In a project called "wild postings" to support the Miata launch, Mazda Motor of America hung posters in a dozen cities at construction sites and other places normally used for movie posters.

"We use [the method] all the time for film releases, and the more I sat in on meetings for the creative and media of the campaign, I realized that the movie audience was a good subset of our prospects," says Tom Somerset, senior VP-director of marketing services at Foote, Cone & Belding, Santa Ana, Calif., agency for Mazda. "It has a little bit of an attitude. It's sort of acceptable graffiti."

Computers offer another area. BMW of North America, along with nine other automakers, advertises on the computer information service Prodigy, which reaches 1.4 million subscribers.

The Jeep/Eagle Division of Chrysler recently ran a computer disc commercial in a disc-based magazine called PC Life, says Randy Schroeder, exec VP-management director/media, Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Southfield, Mich. The commercial was similar to a TV spot, Mr. Schroeder says, but was not as graphically oriented. □

Niche

believe the future of niche marketing isn't in toilet stalls, but databases. Database marketing is the key that allows automakers to communicate with consumers at each phase of the purchase cycle.

Technology will alter the way messages are sent to prospective car buyers and who receives what message, says Audi's Mr. Hilverda.

"I'm a firm believer that [eventually] you should be able to say, 'I want my commercial only to go to these households' and then you can individually select who sees your spot." □

I've been working here for three years."

In retrospect, it seems fitting that he wound up at Rubin Postaer. "I always thought, 'I hope I can work in a place like that and do stuff like that.' "

He says his ideas for Honda commercials can come from anywhere. "They just come out of the ether. You'll get a strategy handed down for a certain car and you'll look at it and stare at your [art director] partner for days on end and out of nowhere it will just click and you'll go, 'What if we did this?' "

He says one great idea came to him when he was ironing. "My mind was wandering, and I just thought of something," he says. The campaign he thought of featured dozens of vanity license plates and later won several awards, despite coming out only weeks before a similar ad for Subaru of America.

Sometimes he gets inspiration on the road.

"We were working the Civic last year. I borrowed the car and put 900 miles on it." The weekend drive resulted in a spot that opened on a blacktop road. Toward the end, the car moves past and the voice-over says, "Feel free to hum along."

"Basically that one came from doing exactly that," he says. "Driving for six hours, just cruising along like at 65-70, putting your mind on hold and just the car was perfect. You could cruise all day like that." □

Regional tastes

the so-called national media to offer such things as split-runs in magazines and regional feeds for the networks. But there are ways to fine-tune even further today.

"Information today is so much better that you can go further than regionalize your message," says Vic Olesen, president of Vic Olesen & Partners, Los Angeles, a consultant to General Motors Corp. "Now you sectionalize, 'city-ize,' even 'block-ize.' "

Mercedes' split account

A recent dramatic example of the regionalization trend came this February when Mercedes-Benz of North America split its account, estimated at $130 million in combined national and regional spending. Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York, was named to handle national, image-creating advertising while its affiliate, the Martin Agency in Richmond, Va., will handle regional, tactical-oriented work.

The Mercedes agency split follows a decision by the German importer in late 1990 to decentralize its U.S. operations, shifting most authority to four regional organizations.

Albert Weiss, general manager-marketing communications at Mercedes, says those regional organizations now control about half of Mercedes' total budget for ad spending, a percentage expected to grow over the next few years.

General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet division and Nissan Motor Corp. USA already have extensive regional ad programs in place.

Chevrolet spends an estimated $75 million, or 20% of its ad budget, on regional ad efforts controlled by four area marketing managers, who focus their efforts on core products with volume and growth potential.

Chevy tailors product

"Different products appeal to different markets," says Richard O'Connor, chairman-ceo of Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., which handles Chevrolet's national advertising and oversees regional offices that work with Chevy's regional marketing teams.

"Texas is a huge market for Suburbans [Chevrolet's full-size sport utility truck]," says Mr. O'Connor. Regional advertising created for that market pitches the Suburban as "the national car of Texas."

"But if you go to the Northeast, you can just about forget selling Suburbans. You have to put your money where your prospective customers are," Mr. O'Connor says.

Regions choose media

At Nissan, fully 50% of its estimated $250 million ad budget is doled out to its seven regions. And each region carries autonomy in choosing media.

"This is designed to let us address problems or attack opportunities as locally as possible," says Earl J. Hesterberg, VP-general manager, Nissan division.

Despite higher costs per thousand, regional media programs become more efficient as they eliminate waste, Mr. Hesterberg says. "We need to spend more efficiently and we need to move quicker than the other guy."

Nissan effectively eliminated its regional dealer groups several years ago and consolidated the work at its national agency, Chiat/Day/-Mojo, Venice, Calif. The move was prompted primarily by the need to make sure regional campaigns dovetailed with national ads.

> "If you only had a dollar to spend, you'd go to the place you sell most of your cars."

Nissan and other Japanese import marketers learned to exploit nontraditional media strategies in part because of necessity. Their domestic competitors enjoyed well-established, national distribution and held long-term relationships with the national media. That left the imports locked out of many of the traditional network TV programs aimed at the prime car-buying demographics.

In many cases, the imports have found that spot TV allows them to direct their ad messages to where their distribution is strongest.

"The old 80/20 or 70/30 rule applies," says Tom Somerset, senior VP-director of marketing services, Foote, Cone & Belding, Santa Ana, Calif., agency for Mazda Motor of America. He points out that the majority of sales come from a fraction of the overall dealer body.

"If you only had a dollar to spend, you'd go to the place you sell most of your cars," he says.

Other marketers also are exploring regional strategies, even if they haven't decentralized their operations. GM's Pontiac division in the past has run California-only outdoor advertising, to reach the mobile West Coast crowd. Ford last year ran some Escort TV spots created specifically to boost California sales.

Three reasons

Ford's Mr. Magee lists three factors as driving regional marketing programs: a desire to test a particular concept before going national; a way to capitalize on a marketer's strength or adjusting to a particularly difficult competitor; or differences in weather that affect consumer preferences when it comes to choices, such as front-wheel drive vs. rear-wheel drive or two- vs. four-wheel drive.

"There are times when regionalization is not only economical, but the only logical thing to do" because of regional biases toward products, says Randy Schroeder, exec VP, management director-media at Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Southfield, Mich., which handles both national and dealer group advertising for Jeep/Eagle.

Jeep/Eagle dealer regional ad groups have taken the unusual step of pooling their funds a couple of times to buy network time, which is considerably less expensive than spot TV on a CPM basis.

Mr. Schroeder says the agency now is looking at ways of matching up Jeep or Eagle products with those of other Chrysler divisions.

Confusion factor looms

One pitfall to regionalization is the increased chance for producing confusing and conflicting brand images. Some marketers such as Nissan and Chrysler keep the conflict to a minimum because national agencies handle dealer marketing groups. But General Motors' dealer ad groups are virtually all handled by agencies other than the ones that create national advertising.

"The real issue in dealer marketing is to make sure the messages by the factory and dealer marketing group are complementary," says Philip Guarascio, GM's executive-in-charge of corporate marketing and advertising. "We make a lot of effort to make sure dealers understand the value of that." □

Who did that ad?

The young copywriters behind the agency wheels of some hot cars.

Treating cars like just another item

Phil Glist took a course at the Advertising Center and got lucky.

One of his teachers was Ed Cole, co-creative director at Foote, Cone & Belding, Santa Ana, Calif.

"I showed him my portfolio after I finished his class," Mr. Glist recalls. At the time, Mr. Cole was making changes in the agency's creative department, and Mr. Glist landed a job writing copy for the Mazda Motor of America account. "It's pretty unusual to get the kind of TV experience that I've been getting," says Mr. Glist, who had been tending bar and waiting tables.

"Jalapenos" helped make the Mazda MX-3 a hot commodity.

The 29-year-old copywriter says he isn't a car nut, but he's learning. "They weren't looking for people who were car nuts. It's easier for people like myself who just treat cars as another product to get inside the heads of people who look at them the same way, as pretty much a big-ticket purchase or an expensive thing to buy," he says.

Sometimes knowing details about the car is a must, so Mr. Glist is picking up expertise quickly. "I had to write an insert [for Mazda's RX-7] that is directed at car buffs—all about the rotary engine and power-to-weight ratio," he says.

His key project has been launching Mazda's MX-3.

"Since it was a new car, we thought the styling would stand out from the other cars, like the Paseo it was competing with. And it was the only one with a six-cylinder engine, so you had to communicate that.

"But we wanted to communicate that this was not a car that everybody was going to like," he says. "Mazda's in a unique position of being a niche marketer."

The result was the "Jalapenos" spot.

"We took a fairly loose storyboard to a fairly young director named Steve Chase, who did wonderful things with the visual side, as did my partner, [Art Director] Kevin Murphy," he says. "It's funny because Mazda's advertising is not the hippest generally. It's real emotion-oriented but it's not usually cutting edge. We got a lot of nice stuff in there. And from what I hear, the car's doing real well."

The campaign drew attention inside the ad world.

"Other people in the agency have come to me and said they've gotten calls from friends in the industry and in production and said, 'Who's the director?' 'Who's the editor?' Actually the best response was from an art director here who asked me, 'How do you get something like that past a client?' "

Even for a guy who's not a car nut, sometimes you've just got to get behind the wheel and put the pedal to the metal. "I drove the new RX-7. It was amazing—after researching it and writing it for a good eight months—to actually finally get in the car and drive it. Theory cannot do justice to it. It's really much more fun. I got it up to a hundred."

And what does he drive now? "I bought a year-old Miata from someone who had a baby and couldn't use a two-seater anymore." □

Ford explores teamwork

In the process, carmaker discovers mother lode

By Joseph M. Winski

Team marketing is proving successful at Ford Motor Co., which first used the market-driven approach, at least partially, with its "Team Taurus" program. Out of that came the stylistically bold and successful Ford Taurus and Mercury Sable midsize cars in 1985.

Ford refined the idea of teams working under strong managers in 1987 and credits this new approach for some of the success of its hot Ford Explorer sport utility vehicle.

Introduced in March 1990, the four-door, four-wheel-drive Explorer rapidly overtook Chrysler Corp.'s Jeep Cherokee to become the country's most popular sport utility vehicle. Its sales last year soared 37%, making it the seventh-best-selling vehicle, the first time a sport utility model has cracked the top 10.

Ford has created three so-called "world-class timing" teams to develop its next generation Probe, Thunderbird and Mustang. Designed to get vehicles from concept to market in about three years, they consist of designers, engineers, buyers, marketers and others who work at the same location and report directly to the product manager rather than their functional bosses.

Marketers on the teams "have a great deal of input into the design of the car," says Steve Odell, Ford Division marketing plans manager for specialty cars. They "constantly remind the team what the customer wants. That is their prime reason for being there." □ cess. When a second fuel crisis occurred in 1979, Japanese car sales spurted again.

This far and no farther, Detroit then said. GM introduced its downsized, front-wheel-drive X-cars; Ford launched its small Ford Escort and Mercury Lynx, which it billed as "world cars." Chrysler bet its future on the K-cars, of which Mr. Iacocca said in ads: "America's not going to be pushed around anymore."

Detroit also demanded, and got, "voluntary" import restrictions on Japanese autos.

The economy improved and the yen strengthened—making Japanese cars more expensive in dollars. The fuel crisis abated, big cars began to sell again and U.S. carmakers posted record profits.

Record losses

But by the end of the 1980s, with another recession looming, Chrysler was once again in deep trouble, GM was frantically paring excess capacity and the Big 3 were heading for record losses.

Detroit, it turned out, hadn't really changed at all. It still managed for short-term profits and still turned out cars through its vertical "chimney" system, in which each function, from design to marketing, operated in virtual isolation.

Marketing was a separate but hardly equal chimney. GM, long dominated by financial executives, didn't even have a consumer market research division until 1985, auto analyst Maryann Keller reported in her 1989 book on the automaker.

Historically, Theodor R. Cunningham, Chrysler exec VP-sales and marketing, admitted in a speech at the Automotive News World Congress in January, "marketing in Detroit has always focused on moving the 'iron' off the shelf, instead of deciding what to put on the shelf in the first place."

The Japanese take marketing much more seriously. Kim B. Clark, a Harvard Business School professor who has studied Japanese auto production, attributes Honda's success, for example, to project teams that "focus the whole [product] development organization on customer satisfaction."

Team members, chosen from all the disciplines involved, including marketing, work together under strong "product managers" on everything.

"Detroit has always focused on moving the 'iron.' "

Keeping an eye out

Marketing is hardly the sole province of marketing executives. Mr. Clark tells of Honda product managers who "spend hours watching people on the street, observing styles and listening to conversations. Department stores, sports arenas, museums and discotheques are all part of their 'market research' beat."

The Japanese strategy, says Mr. Kotler, was to establish a beachhead with high-quality small cars that built consumer loyalty and then move up-market with more expensive and more profitable larger cars.

Thus, for example, the Honda Civic was followed by the Honda Accord, then a larger Accord and, most recently, the Acura Legend.

Honda has been "absolutely brilliant" in moving with its market, FCB's Ms. Cutler says. "There's never been a reason to leave the franchise: If you're ready to move up, they've got it for you."

Detroit belatedly is conceding the Japanese know a thing or two. Ford Motor Co. partly embraced teams (see accompanying story above). General Motors unabashedly stole from the Japanese in setting up Saturn Corp. as an independent operation—in effect a large project "team."

Saturn, whose sales are soaring in a down market, kept its eye firmly on its target—buyers of inexpensive Japanese imports, interviewing thousands of them in developing the car.

Saturn also selected dealers carefully, saturating them with the gospel of customer satisfaction, including elimination of the price haggling that turns off many car buyers.

Walls tumble down

At the "reinvented" Chrysler, as touted in a current corporate ad campaign, the walls between functions have come down and marketers are being listened to, rather than talked at.

"That," says John Damoose, Chrysler VP-marketing, "is a very vital change at Chrysler Corp."

The company organized itself into four "platform teams"—for large cars, small cars, trucks and minivans—in January 1989. "The platform teams have allowed us to truly get the voice of the customer into the product development process," says Mr. Damoose.

Chrysler will tell you where it got the idea: from Honda. □

Encore possible for adman Iacocca

So intertwined with ad message, it appears hard to unhinge ceo from commercials too quickly

By Mary Connelly

Lee Iacocca has become so synonymous with Chrysler Corp. the company has found work for the chairman after he retires.

When he steps down as ceo at year's end, Mr. Iacocca will keep his hand on the wheel at Chrysler as chairman of the five-member executive committee. He says he will no longer be the corporate advertising spokesman, but he has said that before and been wrong.

The heavy use of Mr. Iacocca in this, his last year, indicates the automaker may have a difficult time breaking the marketing tie to the highly visible leader, who was swept into the role of public spokesman during the company's brush with bankruptcy in 1979.

This year, Mr. Iacocca will appear in campaigns for two crucial products: the 1993 Jeep Grand Cherokee and a new trio of 1993 mid-size sedans.

Lee Iacocca's ad importance will increase this fall when the Intrepid, Concorde and Vision sedans are launched.

The Iacocca advertising is part of an 18-month corporate campaign, created by Bozell, New York, that broke during the 1992 Winter Olympics in February.

Image booster

The initial effort in the drive was designed to improve Chrysler's image against foreign brands. In it, Mr. Iacocca stresses Chrysler's restructuring of its product development process, the construction of a $1 billion technology center and new products.

Appearing with three products—the Dodge Viper sports car, Grand Cherokee and Dodge Intrepid, one of the mid-size sedans—he acknowledges the foreign competition. While implying some consumers don't have a high opinion of U.S.-nameplate vehicles, he claims Chrysler vehicles can compete with the best in the world.

As the year goes on, his role will be even more important.

His TV spot for the launch of the Grand Cherokee is scheduled for spring. The vehicle is Chrysler's bid to regain dominance of the sport-utility market, lost to the Ford Explorer.

Later in the year, the Chrysler chairman will be seen in advertising for the Intrepid, Chrysler Concorde and Eagle Vision, the sedans the company maintains have reached standards of world-class manufacturing quality.

At the March 16 press conference where Mr. Iacocca announced that Robert Eaton, the former head of General Motors Corp.'s European operations, would succeed him as chairman, Mr. Iacocca said he had one additional commercial to shoot, presumably for the LH sedans.

"It's hard work," Mr. Iacocca said in explaining why he didn't want to be the corporate spokesman any longer. Referring to the shooting for the Grand Cherokee commercial, which he completed in March, he said: "This one was 100 takes and eight hours. I don't get paid for it."

"I'm outta here," he added.

The LH sedans are Chrysler's first all-new cars since 1980 and critical to the company's future in the car business.

And this yearlong buildup of Mr. Iacocca's image, culminating in his presence in the ads for the sedans, may make it especially difficult for Chrysler to drop him come December.

Indeed, his use this year, during a lengthy manufacturing launch for the sedans with initial limited vehicle supply, may almost ensure an encore performance in 1993, when production volume will increase.

Warning signs

But one observer warns against keeping Mr. Iacocca in front of the cameras for too long.

There are signs Mr. Iacocca's effectiveness is waning, says Steven Levitt, president of researcher Marketing Evaluations/TVQ.

In an annual evaluation of 1,474 American personalities in 1991, the researcher found Mr. Iacocca's positive rating dropped four percentage points from 1987 to 1991, while his negative rating rose six percentage points.

"I'd look at these numbers and I would worry," Mr. Levitt says. "I would wonder if there is a more effective way to advertise. Lee Iacocca is not generating the same response as he did four years ago."

But a Chrysler marketing spokeswoman says Chrysler's own research conducted prior to the creation of the new Bozell campaign disputes those findings.

"He is believable and sincere and he has high recognition numbers," she says.

He also he seems to satisfy what Chrysler considers an important goal of its current advertising.

Japan Inc.

"It used to be that all the Japanese car companies were perceived as one—Japan Inc. There was no real differentiation," says John Damoose, Chrysler's VP-marketing, in an internal company publication. "Today, the domestic Big 3 are seen as indistinct. Today, it's the Big 3 whose image has blended together as Detroit, which is often used as a term of derision. A big part of our goal is to separate Chrysler from the domestic Big 3."

Chrysler still seems to think Mr. Iacocca, today and maybe sometime into the future, can do that job better than anyone else. □ closer to market. Their exhausts are considered less dangerous to the atmosphere than that of gas or diesel engines. "While [alternative] fuels have positive attributes, there are some trade-offs," says Ford's Mr. Fenstermacher.

Trade-off problems

"The principal trade-off is range and convenience. Alternative fuels are not widely available."

Flexible-fuel vehicles, which operate on a combination of fuels including gasoline, already are available in limited quantities to companies with private fleets.

Chevrolet is to deliver 1,200 1992 Luminas that operate on a mixture of 85% methanol and 15% unleaded gasoline.

"The lessons learned as consumers adapt to alternative-fuel vehicles will be invaluable," says Gery Jankovits, the fleet manager for alternative fuel vehicles at Chevrolet.

"This is uncharted territory. No one has a roadmap yet."

Summer tests

Chrysler plans to start general sales of methanol-burning Dodge Spirits and Plymouth Acclaims in California this summer. Its offerings are flexible-fuel vehicles because they can use M85, unleaded gas or any mixture.

The federal government has ordered 2,500 of the cars, but dealers in California will be able to sell them to anyone. Chrysler expects to sell 100,000 of the vehicles in the 1994 model year.

This week, Chrysler intends to deliver 50 full-size vans that run exclusively on compressed natural gas to a California fleet.

An issue beyond fuel is the ozone-depleting chlorinated fluorocarbon refrigerants used in auto air conditioners. The refrigerant usually known by its trade name Freon is being replaced with a CFC-free refrigerant.

Although the new refrigerant requires costly changes to air conditioning systems, automakers have been quick to accept it, well before a worldwide ban on CFC is scheduled to start in 2000.

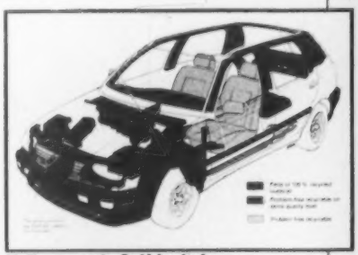
On March 2, Ford became the first U.S. manufacturer to build CFC-free Taurus models and plans to test-market the cars in Texas this year. Mercedes-Benz is also building CFC-free cars.

Manufacturers expect to bear more of the burden for recycling what they sell in the near future.

Volkswagen AG in Germany became the first automaker in the world to set up a pilot program to recycle scrap cars in 1990.

BMW of North America is leading the way in the U.S. It will start a pilot recycling program this spring with the Automotive Dismantlers & Recyclers Association.

The plan combines recycling with marketing incentives to sell new BMWs. During the first phase of the program, BMW will offer a $500 discount on a new BMW purchase when owners return their worn-out BMWs to authorized recycling centers.



Volkswagen's Golf includes recyclable parts, indicated by the shaded areas. Parts are coded to make the separation process easier.

Rich Brooks, a spokesman for BMW, says vehicle recycling isn't yet a popular buying consideration, but he notes that "people who buy our products are predisposed to environmental concerns and apt to do something about it."

Awareness ads

American Honda Motor Co. is among the few companies in the U.S. that created advertising devoted to raising awareness about the environment. It's marketing the 1992 Civic VX with a campaign that's literally green.

A print ad in the campaign is in green ink, right down to the Honda logo, which is usually blue. The headline, "Think of what you can save," refers to money, gasoline and the environment.

The corresponding TV spot shows the car with a forest glen growing up around it. □

Spending hits $3.5 billion

Maserati tops, Ford leads domestics in ad-to-sales ratio

For the 1991 model year, automobile marketers invested about $3.5 billion in U.S. advertising in the measured media monitored by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service (October 1990 through September 1991).

The 24 marketers sold slightly more than 12.5 million vehicles, for an industry ad-to-sales ratio of $276 per unit (see chart at left).

Some marketers did better than others in the efficiency of their advertising buys. Maserati Automobiles was No. 1, with an ad-to-sales ratio of $71. But the importer's ad expenditure was a paltry $17,000, according to LNA.

Among the more mass-market car companies, Ford Motor Co. managed an efficient $147 in advertising per unit sold. Ford spent about $427 million on the measured media. Of the Japanese nameplates, American Honda Motor Co. followed No. 5 General Motors Corp. with $273 in ads per unit sold.

Toyota takes bow

1 in promotions.

"They have many national sales events and spend gobs of-money supporting them," Mr. Hagelstein says. "They bang the hell out of key markets."

All of this helps to raise awareness.

"Toyota's marketing is extremely traditional, almost domestic," says Mark Gjovik, exec VP-group account director, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich. "They do the basics well. They pre-plan their promotions."

Although Toyota's advertising is rarely cited for creative prowess, the company's competitors gave upscale Lexus the highest score in the survey.

"That's probably because of the introduction of the SC400," says Mr. Postaer. "That was a good campaign, the opening wave, including that double fold-out insert. Even I liked that."

Others praise the entire introduction of the new division. "They really left no stone unturned," says Mr. Peterson. "The launch of Lexus was textbook perfect."

Team One's advertising earned high praise for its restraint as well as its attention to detail.

"Lexus' creative is almost sublime," says Mr. Gjovik. "It communicates the idea that 'god is in the details,' and it tells it to you one detail at a time."

Many car commercials try to cram in as many details about the vehicle as possible, a temptation Lexus has avoided.

Having entered the U.S. in 1958, Toyota can now market its cars with American nostalgia.

"It is always tempting to try and put too much in a commercial," says Jay Qualman Jr., general director of advertising for General Motors Corp.'s Buick Division. "When you have 30 seconds, someone will say, "let's talk about four or five key product features."

Lexus tends to focus on a single attribute, such as smoothness of ride in its "Champagne Glasses" commercial or the sound system in its "Rain" spot.

"One exquisite detail after another," says Mr. Gjovik.

In the area of sports marketing, Toyota tied with Chevrolet for the highest score in the Power survey. Toyota's high ranking probably can be attributed to years of high-profile sponsorships.

Examples include the Toyota Grand Prix and its name recognition, as well as a $270 million, four-year deal with CBS for Major League Baseball and its support of the Skins Game golf tournament. The latter draws one of the biggest ratings of any golf event.

Toyota didn't score as well on the subject of green marketing, but another Japanese car company did: Honda.

Honda, which sells more cars in the U.S. than Toyota, has only produced one print ad (printed in green, including the traditionally blue logo) and one spot with environmental themes. However, it has consistently promoted high mileage for many years.

Honda's advertising also stands out because so few automakers in the U.S. currently use environmental themes in their advertising.

With much of the envy of Toyota stemming from its marketing war chest, and given that all the Japanese car companies now face significant profit reductions, Toyota's hold on the leadership marketing position probably will soon be put to the test. □

No waking up from nightmare

New England auto dealer: 'Next person to go is me'

By Jim Henry

Automobile dealers in the Northeast are using every club in the bag to drum up business.

Last year was the second year of a nationwide recession in auto sales, but many Northeast dealers were getting hammered for the third or fourth year.

"I lost money [in 1991] for the first time," says Robert Filardi, who owns Dor Porsche-Buick in Roslyn, N.Y. This happened despite cutting his payroll to 27 employees from a high of about 40.

Surviving dealers are hanging on by unglamorous, tried-and-true methods—selling used cars, promoting service and parts and cutting advertising. (To save money, one dealer says he even cut his trash pick-up from twice to once a week.)

Such tactics might not seem big, but survival has replaced profit as the goal for many dealers.

"It was a horrible year," Mr. Filardi recalls. He sold only 35 new Porsches, compared with 175 in 1986.

He was encouraged that he sold seven Porsches and 32 Buicks this past January, the best month he's had for Buick since he picked up the franchise about a year ago.

Conditions have been particularly bad in New England because of banking and real estate crises on top of unemployment.

In Rhode Island, for instance, the private fund that insured the state's savings & loans was forced into bankruptcy in January 1990.

The state froze the bank accounts of about a third of the state's residents, and some still don't have their money back.

"It seems like everything is happening at the same time," says Aldo Sammartino, a dealer in East Greenwich, R.I. He has cut his staff to 16 from 25 two years ago.

"I got no place left to cut now," he says. "The next person to go is me."

Mr. Sammartino says selling program cars—cars previously in rental programs for up to about 15,000 miles—has helped him get by. He says his Bay Buick store used to average 480 new cars a year; 200 of the 444 cars he sold last year were used.

"I've become much more active in used cars. I go to the auction at least every other week to look at program cars. I fought it for three or four years, but I have to do it to survive," Mr. Sammartino says.

"I've been in the business 18 years, and I'm working harder now than when I started. You're seeing [dealers] who haven't worked in the business in 10 years back out on the showroom floor again. Guys are going to the auctions that haven't been to the auctions in 25 years," he says.

Many dealers aren't making it. From January 1989 to December 1991, the number of dealerships in the six New England states plus New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania fell 7.4% to 5,067, according to National Automobile Dealers Association. The U.S. total fell 5.5% in the same period, while Massachusetts dealerships fell 11.5%, Rhode Island, 13.3%.

"I didn't make it," says a New York-area dealer who filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection last year, after spending half his life working at the family dealership. "I'm still convinced we did everything right that we could control," says the dealer who asked not to be named.

"In the New York area, I don't see an end in sight," he says. "Things are so bad here, even the used-car business is hurting."

Some automakers have tailored their operations to help shore up the Northeast.

Subaru of America, for instance, has a pilot captive-financing arm in New England, in partnership with Nissan Motor Acceptance Corp. It's to help dealers with wholesale and retail financing.

Subaru of New England, an independent distributor, has a much higher percentage of exclusive Subaru dealers than the rest of the country, and the exclusive franchises don't have ready-made financing through other franchises.

Pontiac's New York-based zone started a low-cost lease program for the '91 model year that was so successful the idea was used nationwide.

The program has since been discontinued, but it was "probably the savior of Pontiac in this area" last year, says longtime dealer Eli Bloom, owner of Bloom Pontiac and Saturn of Long Island City (N.Y.).

Mr. Bloom says he still has faith a cyclical business like the auto industry is bound to come back—but says the cycles have gotten longer.

"To say it's the worst ever, I don't know about that; but it's as bad as I've seen it, and it's lasting longer," he says.

He says he has resorted to "very few" layoffs, and has cut, but not eliminated, advertising.

"You can't cut your insurance. You can't cut your heat and light and power . . . So you look at things you can control," Mr. Bloom says.

Is there an upturn in sight?

Mr. Bloom says showroom traffic picked up in January. "It didn't translate into sales to the extent I would like; people are taking longer to make a decision. But the encouraging thing is an awful lot of people are out there looking, and where there's smoke there's fire." □

Program cars turn quagmire

Carmakers' effort to control flow in Florida founders

By Lindsay Chappell

Florida is the center of a nettlesome problem for carmakers.

Last year, about 20 million tourists arrived in Florida by plane, many of them needing a car. As a result, Florida rental agencies purchased about 300,000 new cars. That's 3% of all the new-car sales in the U.S.

The automakers aren't complaining about sending that many cars into Florida, especially since Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and Chrysler Corp. own pieces of major rental chains. The problem is getting the cars out of Florida four to six months after original delivery.

After a few months and a few thousand miles, these rental cars—and those in daily rental fleets elsewhere in the country—are returned to the retail market for resale as so-called "program" cars.

But a recent gambit by U.S. carmakers to gain better control of this huge fleet of program cars looks to be petering out.

GM, Chrysler and Ford all established factory-direct operations last year to move thousands of cars a week from daily rental companies to dealers for used-car sales.

But Chrysler shut its operation down early this year. Ford's effort could end by summer, and GM's attempt is hobbling along with a volume of about 2,000 cars a year.

That probably leaves the factories back where they started—letting national auction chains distribute the cars.

That's good news for the auctions, which derived about $5 billion from such cars last year. It's also an indication the program-car phenomenon has become too big for simple solutions.

Rental companies last year bought one-fifth of the nation's entire new-car volume, according to Auto Rental News, a trade magazine. Many dealers say the surfeit of low-mileage, good-condition used cars is luring buyers away from new cars.

If program-car mileage is too low, pricing on new cars can be undercut. If program cars aren't evenly redistributed around the country, used-car pricing can be undermined.

Although factories and auctions police the trade to prevent "unauthorized buying," it goes on anyway.

Chrysler last year opened an office in West Palm Beach, Fla., to establish dealer-direct sales. Chrysler contended dealers would find it more efficient to order the used cars from the factory than to travel to an auction. But lack of dealer interest caused its closing.

GM's dealer-direct operation also was launched in Florida. Unlike Chrysler's, it's still in business. Dealers phone or fax the office to find out what vehicles are coming back into the market. The dealers can buy the cars sight unseen at set prices before they're passed along to the auction companies.

These experiments raised eyebrows at the auctions, where the idea was apparently more threatening in theory than in practice. GM moved about 700,000 program cars through auctions last year, Ford moved 350,000, and Chrysler about 250,000.

Dale Hermiller, executive director of GM's fleet redistribution operation in Detroit, is quick to allay the auctions' concerns.

"It's not that we're trying to bypass the auctions and save a lot of money," he says. "The auctions will always be the major redistribution method. Our intention is to try to gain better control of what's happening out there."

Ford took a different direction in its dealer-direct experiment by opening four "123 Ford" stores specializing in existing dealerships in different regions of the country to specialize in program cars.

Indications are sales at those stores have been disappointing so far, and Ford appears to be reconsidering the idea.

Carmakers now are looking for other means of regaining market control. They're reducing the overall program-car volume by selling the rental companies fewer cars during the year. In 1991, most rental agencies turned their fleets over three times, keeping cars an average of four months. Due to factory policy, many will cut back to a six-month cycle this year.

That also will push up the mileage on the average program car. Mr. Hermiller says the average GM program car showed about 10,000 miles at the beginning of 1991 but had increased to 13,000 by yearend.

Tom Cunningham, Ford's manager of vehicle remarketing, says his company's program cars are beginning to show up near the 20,000-mile level. □

In Europe, image is key

As exec puts it, 'Lexus and Infiniti are fantastic cars but lack class'

By Diana T. Kurylko

Writing from Frankfurt

With the prospect of European Community quotas on Japanese cars being dropped in eight years, European manufacturers already are playing up an attribute those competitors won't be able to buy or build: heritage.

And that isn't necessarily the automaker's country of origin.

For a German manufacturer like BMW, it's superior engineering. A.B. Volvo of Sweden has a reputation for safe cars. Italian Alfa Romeo rides on the laurels of engines that won numerous races. The French Renault has savoir-faire.

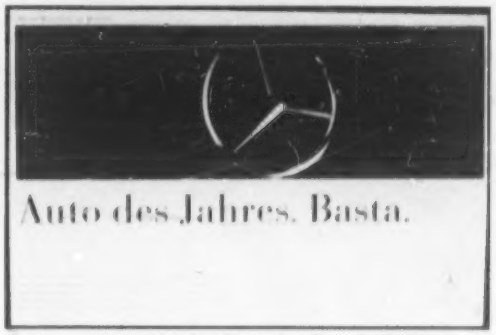
In that subtle European way, the major marques are solidifying images created over decades.

"The Japanese are creating an impetus to have traditional European car manufacturers look at what their cars stand for," says Douglas Thursby-Pelham, management supervisor at ad agency Publicis, London, which handles Renault. "The Japanese are advanced technologically. They are great copiers, but one thing they can't quickly appropriate is heritage. Lexus and Infiniti are fantastic cars, but they lack class."

German-based Volkswagen AG, Europe's No. 1 automaker, is stressing safety and environmental friendliness in its cars.

"As far as safety and the environment go, this is a differentiator. We will be more advanced than the Japanese and the competitors," says Hans Hungerland, member of the VW management board responsible for Volkswagen/-Audi sales worldwide.

Alfa Romeo is climbing upstream and counting on its performance image to lure buyers. It no longer is just building sports cars like the Spider or "pure Alfas" like the 75, high on performance but short on comfort. Alfa models are becoming bigger and more luxurious—competition for Audi, BMW, Mercedes-Benz and Volvo.



German commercial for Mercedes-Benz touts the nameplate as "Car of the Year. Period." European automakers are pushing image hard.

Philip Gamba, VP-marketing at Renault, believes Japanese brands lack the "French touch" of that automaker's designs and credibility. "We have culture and a touch at making cars the Japanese don't," he says.

The major difference between French and Japanese cars is cost, Mr. Gamba says. But he adds, "We have eight years to get on the same level with price and in our way of work."

These days, Renault is "building a car for the occupant with a lot of effort on comfort," he says. "We believe the car cannot be for status; we are not prestige-oriented."

BMW is trying to communicate not the prestige of owning a luxury marque but "the inner value" of its cars, says Richard Gaul, a company spokesman.

"In our price class, safety and comfort will be of more importance than the outlook and presence of being affluent," he says. "To communicate value in products will be of growing importance."

BMW's edge may be its German heritage, but it leaves itself room to assemble cars elsewhere. "BMW is engineering in our environment. Made in Germany or made in Europe will all be the same," he says.

Audi will play up the Germanness of its cars.

Neil Christie, account director on Audi at London agency Bartle Bogle Hegarty, says the Japanese are associated with value for money, high specifications and technical expertise.

"The [European] car market will have to be more focused about developing their individual [brand] images and reputations," he says.

But not every car company will want to stress its country of origin, Mr. Christie says.

"It would be much more difficult for a car company like Rover Group to emphasize its country of origin since the U.K. isn't an appealing country of car manufacturers."

Similarly, Mr. Christie says, Volvo probably will continue to advertise safety rather than its Swedish heritage.

Matsola Palm, exec VP of Volvo, says the company is focusing on four areas that have been key for the Swedish maker: "safety, environmental care, reliability and durability."

But as other carmakers stress these features, Volvo's fight to differentiate itself from the competition will become more difficult, he admits. "If you are in the forefront, the others have to pick up. You cannot stay and wait or you will be passed." □

In Japan, Detroit dares to compare

By Mary Ann Maskery

Writing from Tokyo

U.S. automakers are trying to change the popular image of their automobiles here by using imported marketing tactics.

Comparative advertising, which General Motors Corp. is trying, historically hasn't gone over well in this country. Direct mail, a cornerstone of Chrysler Corp.'s plan, is expensive and difficult. And new-car showrooms were practically unknown until Ford Motor Co. and Mazda Motor Corp. started using them about a decade ago.

Comparison ads have been legal here since 1986, but GM is the first company to fully exploit the tactic. GM recently unveiled a new print ad from McCann-Erickson Hakuhodo that specifically compares the size, fuel efficiency, quality and price of Cadillac Seville STS with Nissan Motor Corp.'s Infiniti Q45.

"We have felt for a long time there are major misconceptions in Japan about American cars. We want to dispel them," says Jim Steinhagen, VP for General Motors Japan. GM is trying to change the image of American cars as big, expensive gas-guzzlers with inferior quality.

On the surface, the GM campaign is risky. Popular wisdom suggests Japanese consumers have never accepted comparative ads.

"I don't think comparison advertising will increase in Japan because it does not fit the Japanese culture and will not be accepted," says a Hakuhodo agency spokesman.

Yet two previous brushes with the technique suggest it could find some success.

Last May, Pepsi-Cola Co. pulled a TV commercial featuring rap star Hammer that showed a can of Coca-Cola after four Tokyo stations refused to continue running it. In August, two stations resumed play with the cans inked out and an audio reference to Coke bleeped.

Nissan Motor Sales broached the edge of discretion in 1988, when then-President Yutaka Kume named Honda's Prelude as the target for his company's Silvia coupe. Though Mr. Kume's comments at a press introduction were never part of advertising, they were criticized in the press.

Silvia sales overtook Prelude sales seven months after the car was introduced, but Nissan hasn't repeated any such similar move.

The new GM campaign has drawn widespread news coverage, but it's too early to determine how consumers here will react to it.

Yoshikazu Iino, deputy manager for PR at Yanase & Co., GM's distributor, says there has been no negative comment to date. And Hiroshi Kurebayashi, a manager at the Dentsu ad agency, which handles Ford Motor Co., says the GM ad "is done in a reserved tone and will be accepted favorably."

> "Comparison advertising . . . does not fit the Japanese culture."

Chrysler Japan Sales, which handles most Chrysler business in Japan with agencies Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising K.K. for Jeep and Bozell Meitsu for Chrysler passenger cars, is using another tactic that's not so controversial as it is difficult.

The marketer isn't running any TV commercials because of the high cost, says Izumi Kato, member of the liaison division for Chrysler Japan Sales, but it's supplementing its print advertising with direct mail.

"The direct mail concept is just beginning in Japan," GM's Mr. Steinhagen says, because many Japanese have a concern for privacy, making it difficult to compile an effective list.

Detroit's Big 3 have made major efforts to expand sales in Japan. GM sales grew 8.8% to 9,261 units in 1991, despite a 10.7% falloff in the import segment during the same period. Ford sold 2,959 imported units, down 50.9%, and Chrysler sold 1,491 cars and Cherokees, up 4.1%.

Ford executives applaud GM's approach. "We think [the campaign] is a very good thing to improve the image of American cars," says Hiroo Tanabe, manager of external affairs for the Ford importer.

Ford has made its own effort to make a dent in the popular image of American cars. Last year, it invited several Japanese journalists to the U.S. for a 1,000-mile test drive from Dearborn, Mich., to Atlanta.

The resulting articles in Japanese car-enthusiast magazines were somewhat critical, says Mr. Tanabe. "But, overall, it was successful. At least they saw the vehicles as they are."

Ford Japan is discussing further ways to promote sales with Autorama, the sales channel jointly owned with Mazda that was set up to sell Ford imports and Ford-badged vehicles built by Mazda. Autorama introduced the concept of showroom sales to Japan when it was formed 10 years ago. □

Super Bowl not so super

Viewership fell during commercials, study shows

By Joe Mandese

The Super Bowl might not be as strong an ad buy as game ratings indicate.

While CBS' coverage of Super Bowl XXVI delivered impressive ratings, new a Lintas:USA analysis of Nielsen Media Research data found wide fluctuations in audience levels.

"A clear pattern emerges: Commercial ratings are lower than program ratings," Lintas reported.

The agency estimated audiences during commercial breaks were 4% lower on average than audiences watching the game.

The largest gap came during the game's fourth quarter, with a 2.8 rating-point difference between program and commercial audiences. The narrowest gap was during the first quarter, a 0.4 rating-point difference.

"We have a great deal of concern regarding these differences," the Lintas report said. "They appear slight . . . but reflect a great number of commercial impressions not delivered."

MEDIA WORKS

In the national telephone survey of 500 adults conducted during the week after the Super Bowl, 64% said they watched at least part of the game. About 74% of those respondents said they watched at home; 24% at a friend's; and 2% at a bar, restaurant or hotel.

The study also confirmed the impact Fox Broadcasting Co.'s halftime counterprogramming had on CBS' halftime ratings (AA, March 2). Fox's live episode of "In Living Color" captured the "entire 15 share points lost by CBS" during its halftime coverage, Lintas reported.

Also, a significant portion of viewers tuned to CBS' halftime show weren't actually watching it, Lintas' survey found.

Only a third of respondents tuned to the halftime show were in the room and paying attention, giving CBS a 14 rating for commercial-attentive adults. The network's ratings average for the game was 40.3.

Lintas expects Fox and possibly others to repeat the grab for the halftime audience. □

Clutter suffers zap attacks

NEW YORK—Bozell has developed a model to determine the impact of increased TV clutter on channel switching.

A 10% increase in prime-time clutter spurs a 7% increase in channel switching on the Big 3 networks, Bozell reported. The model uses 1990 data from Nielsen Media Research and the Association of National Advertisers and American Association of Advertising Agencies' Commercial Monitoring Report.

Bozell is using a proprietary report with 1991 data for upfront negotiations.

Clutter is all non-programming time, including commercials, public service announcements, station identifications and promotions, and program credits.

The 10% increase in clutter didn't boost channel switching as much on independent stations and Fox Broadcasting Co., but prompted even more switching on cable networks.

While 10% is an arbitrary number for the model, John McSherry, senior VP-director of corporate media resources, said it's about the same level the Big 3 increased prime-time clutter in the year ended Nov. 30, 1991.

Existing non-programming time per hour averages 12 minutes, 35 seconds on the Big 3; 13 minutes, 50 seconds on five cable networks; 14 minutes, 16 seconds on Fox; and 14 minutes, 33 seconds on independent stations.

The projected switching levels show a best-case scenario; actual switching is probably higher, Mr. McSherry said.

Nielsen this month released new data on channel switching. Among its findings:

- Channel switching varies by daypart and demographic, with weekend sports highest and early morning lowest.
- Men switch more than women.
- Younger viewers switch more than older ones.
- Longer programs have the greatest channel switching; shorter programs have the least. □

Ad clutter spurs channel switching

Viewers are increasingly likely to change channels as clutter grows. With a 10% boost in non-programming time, channel switching jumps an average of 7% for broadcast and cable TV, according to a model using Nielsen Media Research data and the Commercial Monitoring Report from the Association of National Advertisers and American Association of Advertising Agencies.

Worth* more. Worth, New York, will increase its rate base 25% to 250,000 with the August/September issue, its fourth. Ad rates will rise 25% to $9,625 for a b&w page, $14,375 for color. The April/May issue of the personal finance magazine carries 70 ad pages.

Kids guaranteed. While problems persist over Nielsen Media Research's measurement of children's TV viewing, it appears most upfront kids programming buys will get audience guarantees. Fox Broadcasting Co. recently concluded about $100 million in 1992-93 upfront kids deals, with firm guarantees for specific demographic groups. Most cable and syndication companies also are giving firm guarantees. And while many buyers had expected ABC to try to scrap the guarantees, network VP-Daytime Sales John Shanley said ABC probably will give guarantees when kids upfront sales start next month. "If everyone else is giving guarantees, we will too," he said.

Nickelodeon goes to press. Nickelodeon, New York, in March 1993 plans to launch an ad-supported magazine targeting 8-to-12-year-olds. The cable TV network said the magazine will "take the channel's exuberant attitude and irreverence" and will have a "slightly off-center perspective." The 10-times-yearly title will be distributed through newsstands and subscriptions; it won't be part of Nickelodeon's multimedia packages. Ad rates and rate base haven't been set.

Cooking up a spin-off. Rodale Press' Prevention distributed to newsstands 300,000 copies of its March test issue of Prevention's Quick & Healthy Cooking, a digest-size spinoff of the health magazine. A second issue will be published in September with newsstand distribution of 400,000. A color page is $5,000. Emmaus, Pa.-based Rodale plans to publish the recipe title as a quarterly starting next year.

Seventeen* goes to college. K-II Magazines' Seventeen will launch with its June issue a college column designed to strengthen its positioning as a bridge book between teen and young women's magazines. Publisher Janice Grossman said the monthly reaches 2.5 million women 18 to 24. She said other projects, including a broadcast venture and more editorial additions, are planned. □

THE PRINTED WORD

Gay and lesbian publications have made inroads with national advertisers, but hope to attract more.

Gay titles chase mainstream ads

By Janice Kelly

Advertising and circulation performance of publications

Gay publications are increasing their bid for national advertising from mainstream marketers.

Titles targeting gay and lesbian readers have traditionally relied on sexually oriented advertising, but a handful of mainstream marketers have been regular advertisers there, too.

Now, a new crop of publications, including BLK and Genre, are attracting new national advertisers such as Carillon Importers' Absolut vodka and Columbia House records, while turning down sexually explicit ads.

Still, many advertisers are reluctant to use gay publications, said Doug Alligood, VP-special markets for BBDO Worldwide, New York.

"The gay press is cutting out sex ads to make the titles more appealing to mainstream marketers," he said. "They got away from offending mainstream sensibilities; that had to happen before advertisers could take the medium seriously. But mainstream advertisers are now wondering who will be the first to advertise in these magazines."

"Mainstream advertisers are now wondering who will be the first to advertise."

Still, "advertisers can't ignore the growing market," said Michael Gravois, president of Rivendell Marketing, Plainfield, N.J., which represents 175 lesbian and gay publications. "The gay press is receiving a lot more support from Madison Avenue because the idea and word 'gay' are becoming more visible."

Twenty-two gay and lesbian magazines were introduced last year, according to Samir Husni's Guide to New Magazines. At least two national gay magazines are slated to make their debut this year. New York-based Out, which bills itself as "a gay and lesbian Mirabella or Esquire with a little bit of gay and lesbian Cosmopolitan thrown in," will appear in June. Los Angeles-based Puhleeze!, a gay humor magazine, hits newsstands in May.

Here's how some of the top titles are performing:

- Genre, Los Angeles (Genre Publishing): The national lifestyle magazine celebrates its first anniversary with the April/May issue, when it will step up publication to every other month from quarterly. Genre targets men, describing itself as a cross between Esquire and GQ. About 75% of ad pages are from national advertisers.

1991 ad pages: 126. Circulation: 100,000. Ad rates: b&w page: $3,780; color page: $4,600.

- The Advocate, Los Angeles (Liberation Publications): The 25-year-old every-other-weekly is the dominant national title, carrying 147.91 pages of national advertising last year, up 103% from 1990. The Advocate plans to switch to glossy paper with its June 5 issue.

1991 ad pages: 2,107.22. Circulation: 75,000 paid. Ad rates: b&w page: $1,830; color page: $3,161.

- NYQ, New York (NYQ Publishing): The gay and lesbian general newsweekly is testing national subscription for a possible roll-out; 30% of its subscription base is scattered across the U.S.

1991 ad pages: 211. Circulation: 15,000. Ad rates: b&w page: $650; color page: $1,350.

- BLK, Los Angeles (BLK Publishing Co.): This monthly news magazine targets the black gay community. Editorial includes features, news, reviews of the arts and coverage of politics and health. Attracting advertising has been a problem, so the publication relies on volunteer labor to meet its budget. BLK shifted to paid circulation of 11,000 from controlled circulation of 37,000.

Stoli budget boost aimed at Absolut

By Gary Levin

PepsiCo Wines & Spirits will double spending behind Stolichnaya vodka this year in a bid to match the ubiquitous advertising for Carillon Importers' leading import Absolut.

The company will spend about $14 million in 1992, expanding both frequency and media schedule by adding more magazines and more back-cover placements, as well as outdoor and transit advertising.

PepsiCo Wines & Spirits hopes to fund the spending increase with what it says is the U.S. government's imminent award of a most-favored-nation trading status with Russia. That would eliminate an average $1.25-per-bottle penalty tax on Russian vodka imports.

"It will enable us to grow Stoli faster [because] we'll be able to promote it more heavily," said Gary Matthews, VP-marketing at PepsiCo Wines & Spirits.

Tagline for the brand's current campaign is "the Russian phenomenon. Calet, Hirsch & Spector, New York, is the agency.

The budget increase "should firm up the brand in '92," said Frank Walters, director of research for Impact, an industry publication.

Absolut spends about $25 million a year through TBWA, mostly in magazines.

Stoli is hiking ad spending to rival leading import Absolut.

Separately, Pepsico Wines & Spirits last week broke a whimsical print and outdoor campaign for Priviet vodka in its Boston, Chicago and Dallas test markets. Ads tout the "amazing Russian vodka's" ability to "change color when mixed with fruit juices" and to "take on the shape of any glass."

Impact figures show No. 2 Stoli's sales fell 10% last year, while Absolut held steady, Heublein's No. 3 Finlandia rose 4.6% and Schieffelin & Somerset Co.'s Tanqueray Sterling dropped 22%. Stoli sold 1.03 million cases in the U.S. □

Liquor sales drop 4% in '91

By John C. Maxwell Jr.

MAXWELL REPORT

In a year hard hit by recession, the liquor industry declined an estimated 4% to 4.5% in 1991. However, some of this decline relates to inventory-building in 1990 in anticipation of federal excise tax increases, and subsequent liquidation in 1991.

Other problems hampering growth included state tax increases, the war in the Middle East, industry consolidation, the health and fitness movement and a general consumer resistance to price increases.

All industry categories declined in volume last year. Brown goods again turned in a weaker performance than white goods. The whiskey category declined an estimated 6.3%, primarily due to the drop in scotch sales. Brandy showed an estimated decline of 7.8%.

The No. 1 brand remained Bacardi Imports' Bacardi with 4.6% share of market, topping the 3.7% of Heublein's Smirnoff brand. House of Seagram's Seagram's gin, one of the few to gain sales in 1991, moved to third place from sixth in 1990.

Jim Beam Brands Co. took over the No. 1 position among liquor companies from Heublein, helped in large part by the acquisition of seven brands from Seagram. □

Phillips Petroleum brings back 'performance company' tag

BARTLESVILLE, Okla.—Phillips Petroleum Co. is returning to its "The performance company" tagline, not used since the mid-1980s.

The tag replaces "Good things for cars and the people who drive them" and is being used in cable TV spots that broke this month. The commercials from Tracy-Locke, Dallas, spotlight product development, education and protection of the environment. Magazine and newspaper advertising will also support.

Texas Rangers baseball star Nolan Ryan will pitch Phillips 66 Co. gasoline in two 15-second TV spots set to break May 9 in the Dallas-Fort Worth area. Eight 15-second retail gasoline spots support in other markets.

Ad spending in 1992 is expected to be flat. Phillips spent $8.8 million in the first nine months of 1991, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. □

Area sports cable scores ad deals

By Alison Fahey

Regional sports cable TV networks are looking to make big gains in the ad sales game this year as they adopt more sophisticated marketing techniques.

Several are now trying to lure advertisers with customized promotional and value-added sponsorship packages not unlike those offered by ESPN.

Prime Ticket Network, a regional network serving about 4.2 million subscribers in southern California, Arizona, Nevada and Hawaii, recently signed John Paul Mitchell Systems to a $1 million, two-year package deal.

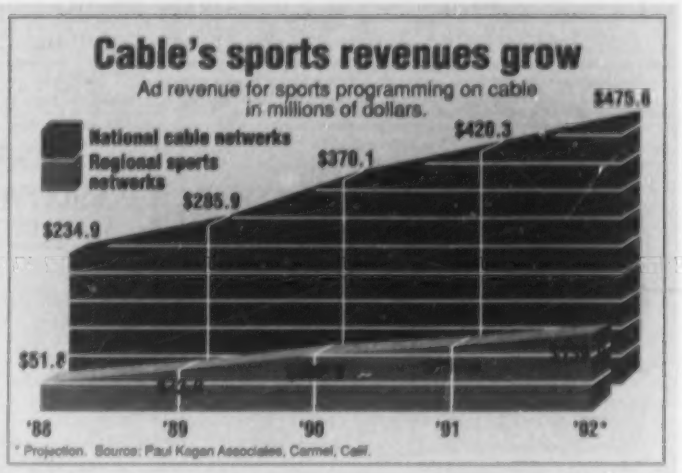
The agreement calls for the haircare product marketer to sponsor some programs and help underwrite others, in addition to regular ad time.

The deal is indicative of the network's new philosophy of seeking out "advertising partners" rather than simply selling marketers the traditional 30-second spot, said Don Corsini, Prime Ticket's exec VP-programming and production.

"Packaging programming with sales allows us to tap marketing and promotional dollars that weren't in the marketplace," Mr. Corsini said.

The John Paul Mitchell deal is the biggest one completed by Prime Ticket's sports marketing division, a new unit designed to create value-added marketing opportunities.

Madison Square Garden Network, the largest regional sports network, reaching 4.6 million homes in some Northeastern markets, started selling packages about a year ago. Some of the deals struck include arena signage, event sponsorships, TV time on the cable network and merchandising opportunities.



John Hall

Advertisers that have bought packages include American Express Travel Related Services Co., General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet Division, 7-Eleven Stores and Benjamin Moore & Co.

"Our relationship with our advertisers has never been better," said Douglas Moss, former head of ad sales at the cable network, who last week was named president.

With increasing ad sales effort and the local marketing edge, regional networks are poised for ad sales growth in 1992, industry observers say.

"I think they are one of the most, if not the most, important programming [venues] locally," said John Mansell, senior analyst at Paul Kagan Associates.

For 1992, Kagan projects ad revenue on regional sports networks to grow 18.7% to $139.6 million.

Last year, the 27 regional sports networks tracked by Kagan combined generated $117.6 million in ad revenue, a healthy 14.3% increase over 1990. □

Petersen mulls new titles

By Bradley Johnson

LOS ANGELES—When Robert Petersen turned 65 last fall, he didn't collect a gold watch. He already owns a Rolex, thank you. The founder, chairman and sole shareholder of Petersen Publishing Co. has no plans to leave, nor is he worrying much about succession.

Petersen

"I don't intend to go," he said with a chuckle.

In fact, the publisher of 15 monthly specialty titles—including Motor Trend, Guns & Ammo and 'Teen—and three dozen every-other-monthlies and annuals is looking to the future after a down year in 1991.

In a wide-ranging interview in his Sunset Strip office, Mr. Petersen spoke about a publishing rebound, plans for new titles and whether there's a difference between Motor Trend's Car of the Year and advertiser of the year.

"The adversity in publishing that we're having now is bad and good," he said. "A lot of people that are in the business are going to go out, and I think it's going to be better for the people that are left. You'll see a cleaning out of books. Then I'll be ready to launch some new ones."

Mr. Petersen said he's reached no final decisions on new magazines.

"We've got two or three [fields] we're looking at," including general-interest men's magazines, bicycling and a 'Teen spinoff, he said. "We could launch a new magazine this year. We're looking at some starts or possibly purchasing some."

The company in the mid-'70s folded an acquired general-interest men's title, True, but Mr. Petersen said the crowded market still has room for "the right magazine."

Mr. Petersen started the company with Hot Rod in 1948 after being fired as a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer publicist, and he still relies largely on gut instinct in picking new titles. Like many of his readers, he's an avid sportsman and car enthusiast, though on a grander scale. His lobby is decked out with a 12-foot stuffed polar bear he bagged with a revolver, and he commutes to work in a bright red Bentley.

Petersen Publishing blossomed in the magazine boom of the '80s, with its ad pages growing 45% to 11,352 from 1981 to 1991. Reported ad revenues for that decade nearly tripled to $138.5 million, and circulation revenues grew threefold to $147.5 million.

The company came close to holding its own last year despite the recession. Ad pages fell 4.5% from the record 1990 level, while ad revenues dipped 1.5%. Two marginal titles, Petersen's Fishing and Hot Truck, closed.

Mr. Petersen anticipates a small, single-digit increase this year in ad pages, putting Petersen Publishing back where it was two years ago.

He hotly defended the editorial integrity of Motor Trend's Car of the Year award. The winning car marketer usually promotes the award heavily, and some outsiders and competing magazines periodically allege the award is influenced by advertisers.

"We do it by the numbers, and we do it with everybody looking on," he said. Competing magazines "don't like us having a car recognize us and us recognize a car, but I think it's a damn good promotion, a damn good test."

Mr. Petersen is the only Petersen at Petersen Publishing; his two sons died in a plane accident in the 1970s. The question of succession is unanswered, and Mr. Petersen said he has no interest in selling the company.

"Why would I sell it?" he said. "I don't need any money. We don't owe any money. We don't have any problems. That's a good way to be." □

Mideast satellite TV has strong start

By Stephen Downer

LONDON—After seven months on the air, the Middle East Broadcasting Center, the first international satellite TV service in Arabic, is airing about 12 minutes of advertising each evening and well on its way to breaking even in 1994.

Its potential audience consists of 5 million Arabic speakers in Western Europe and 100 million from Morocco to the borders of Iran and Pakistan.

As of early March, orders for some 150 commercials had been submitted through U.K. ad representative International Publicity Services, said Nick Pearse, managing director of the ad rep company.

Advertisers have included auto marketers Toyota Motor Corp., BMW and Ford Motor Co.; oil companies Mobil Oil Co. and Castrol; soft-drink marketer Coca-Cola Middle East; and toiletries giant Gillette Co., promoting its Sensor razor.

The network claims to have attracted its first program sponsor, but Mr. Pearse wouldn't disclose the name.

The network emphasizes news, rounding out programming with movies, miniseries, cultural programs and network-produced magazine shows.

Programming doesn't include Western soap operas, "but there is Arabic light entertainment," said Bob Kennedy, deputy chief executive of Middle East Broadcasting, based in the network's London studios.

Broadcast time has risen to 12 from 6 hours a day since its launch last September.

The network won't air more than 11 minutes of ads per hour and no more than 3 minutes during a single break. A 30-second prime-time spot ranges from $750 up to $2,000 for the evening news.

GLOBAL NEWS

"What we are looking for is the advertising that can be considered pan-Arab," Mr. Kennedy said.

Research for the network has made it clear "there are many more pan-Arab than pan-European advertisers," he said.

The broadcaster says its goals are being met so far. "We set a target for the first year, and if we continue at the present rate, we will very soon hit it. I would guess we will exceed our first year's expectations," Mr. Kennedy said. He wouldn't elaborate on those expectations.

The broadcaster is owned by a consortium of Middle East entrepreneurs, including Walid al-Ibrahim, a brother-in-law of Saudi Arabian King Fahd. □

Keebler bites on new products

By Julie Liesse

Keebler Co. has hit the sweet spot.

Recently named the American Marketing Association's New Product Marketer of the Year, Keebler is unleashing a spring new-product barrage.

The cookies and cracker are telling retailers that three new products will get more than $50 million in support.

First off the bat is Toffee Toppers, a shortbread cookie with toffee bits, enrobed in chocolate and drizzled with toffee.

The new product will be promoted as part of a repackaging of Keebler's other chocolate-enrobed cookies under the new Fudge Shoppe umbrella name. A March 22 free standing insert introduced Toffee Toppers.

A second new cookie product is Sweet Spots, bite-size shortbread cookies each topped with a fudge drop. Sweet Spots is sold in single-serving packs of four cookies, with 18 servings in a box.

"This is a totally new kind of packaging for us—the convenience, lunch-bag type of package," said Keebler VP Stuart Greenblatt. "You'll see us doing even different things with Sweet Spots in convenience stores, too."

A TV campaign featuring the omnipresent Keebler Elves will break in April to introduce Sweet Spots; couponing and sampling will also support. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles Keebler's consumer advertising account.

New Quangles is a multigrain salty chip directly aimed at Frito-Lay's SunChips, which racked up $100 million in sales last year. Quangles comes in two flavors, original and Monterey ranch. TV from Burnett, couponing and a broad sampling program will support the late spring launch. The round chips are being promoted as "a new angle on snacking."

Sweet Spots is a new cookie from the Keebler Elves.

Keebler hopes Quangles can build on its recent success in the salty snack market. The marketing association cited Keeblers' Pizzarias chips, which chalked up $75 million in first-year sales, and Munch'ems crackers, at $85 million, as two of the reasons the company was being honored.

"Keebler has developed a good sense at identifying trends and matching those trends with innovative new products," Mr. Greenblatt said. □

Smaller is beautiful in '90s fight for accounts

Hunt for creativity lures marketers from big shops

An Advertising Age roundup

Smaller shops have got the Big Mo.

Routinely ignored by major marketers in the past, small and midsize ad agencies are winning more large accounts, gaining momentum on their much bigger brethren.

In recent months, major assignments snared by shops with billings of less than $500 million include the $80 million American Isuzu Motors account won by Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco; the $35 million Nutri/System account won by Lotus Minard Patton McIver, New York; a substantial chunk of the $45 million Pearle account won jointly by GSD&M, Austin, Texas, and Wyse Advertising, Cleveland; and the $35 million Compaq Computer Corp. account won by Ammirati & Puris, New York.

In many of the recent account switches, the smaller agencies have gone head-to-head against big-name shops—like Pearle incumbent Foote, Cone & Belding and Compaq incumbent Ogilvy & Mather—and come out victorious.

The small and midsize agencies, moreover, are getting into a lot more competitions than they were just a year ago.

An informal tracking of agency reviews by Advertising Age found 46—or 72%—of the 64 agencies participating in 24 reviews identified through mid-March of this year were small to midsize shops.

That's up from the same period last year, when 37—or 56%—of 66 agencies that competed in 22 re-

Time Inc. 'floats' rate idea

Publisher mulls seasonal changes in reader guarantees

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Time Inc. is exploring the concept of "floating" rate bases for its mass-market magazines and could start testing the idea this fall.

Under the plan, the magazines' rate bases, or circulation guarantees, and ad rates would be moved up or down during the year to reflect seasonal trends in circulation.

Magazines would be able to charge advertisers for higher circulation and avoid rebates to advertisers during weaker sales periods. Under the current system, if a magazine sells more copies than it guarantees in the fixed rate base, advertisers aren't charged for the bonus circulation; if it misses that rate base, rebates are given in the form of cash or space.

Although the floating rate base idea isn't completely new to the magazine industry, it's never been put into wide practice or used at subscription-driven magazines.

"We'd like to be the first," said S. Christopher Meigher, president of Time Inc.'s New York-based magazines and a former circulation executive. "We're going to try to figure out if there's something there."

The company has no solid plans to test floating rate bases at this time, he said, but is actively exploring the idea and might test it this fall.

Mr. Meigher declined to speculate on which Time Inc. titles would par-

Opening Day, and the Bunny goes up to bat

By Julie Liesse

The Energizer Bunny will deliver the first "pitch" of the 1992 baseball season.

Major League Baseball kicks off its season today, and a live version of the ubiquitous pink bunny will be covering the bases from Seattle to Philadelphia, making on-field, Opening Day visits.

During the next nine days, he will interrupt the Phillie Phanatic, stalk the outfield at Seattle's Kingdome and be crossing the mound at the Cubs' Wrigley Field.

Eveready Battery Co. has negotiated the on-field appearances in conjunction with a major radio buy. In the deal, Energizer has become a sponsor of the seasonlong radio broadcasts for all 24 U.S. Major League Baseball clubs.

The on-field appearances are an adjunct to the radio deals, and Eveready last week was scrambling to line up a bunny/actor to be at each team's home opener.

The deal wasn't easy to snare. Most teams balked at Eveready's original idea: to have the bunny on the pitcher's mound as the home

James blasts promotions

Incoming 4A's chief to fight trade spending

By Pat Sloan

NEW YORK—Bob James wants the ad industry to fight back against the inclination to redirect advertising money to trade promotion.

The McCann-Erickson Worldwide chairman, who will be elected chairman of the American Association of Advertising Agencies at its annual convention this week, said he's not opposed to consumer-oriented promotion like couponing. His concern is certain trade incentives like slotting allowances, which he views as a dangerous consequence of the retail trade's "inexorable appetite."

"I think it has taken the industry a long time to realize money is not going for promotional purposes at all," Mr. James said. "It's really going for retailers."

Mr. James said recent revelations that H.J. Heinz Co. and others are cutting ad spending but increasing promotional spending "bespeaks the need to take overt action."

"It's time to shake people by the lapels," he said, "to call attention to the problem and come up with solutions. To find another way to satisfy the trade.

"Where I intend to focus my time and effort with the Four A's is making sure our people are able to convince clients the most effective way they can spend marketing money is through the medium of advertising.

"When you let this go for a quick fix, you can get away with it in the short term, but eventually it catches up. It kills the goose that lays the golden egg."

Mr. James maintained that with less advertising and innovation, brand value erodes.

"As soon as people easily accept substitutes for a product, you know the cancer is proceeding," he said. "The next step is they are unwilling to pay the price, the next step is store brands and the next step is commodities."

This, he argued, isn't good for the trade either, because stores then become commodities themselves.

"Tiffany's vs. Fortunoff [a jewelry chain] is a graphic example of the value of the brand," he

'Men's Journal' to get quick start

NEW YORK—The launch plan for Men's Journal is being accelerated even before the first issue reaches newsstands April 14. Straight Arrow Publishers Chairman Jann Wenner said there will be two issues this year; then next year, the magazine for active men will go every-other-monthly rather than quarterly as first planned. The launch issue carries 83 paid ad pages from a wide variety of categories.

Omnicom rumors swirl

NEW YORK—Rumors were rampant at press time that Omnicom Group was on the verge of a merger of its Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein and Tracy-Locke units or a new acquisition. One potential acquisition mentioned was McCaffrey & McCall; an executive at McCaffrey denied that, as did Omnicom Chief Financial Officer Fred Meyer, who had no comment on other possible acquisitions. An Omnicom spokesman knew of no plans to merge Goodby and Tracy-Locke, though an Omnicom insider maintained such a move could be an-

Sega is game for review of $65M unified account

By Cleveland Horton

Sega of America has opened its consolidated $65 million videogame account to a full-blown agency review.

A limited number of West Coast agencies this week will get packages from the No. 2 videogame marketer. The account is now split between Bozell, Los Angeles, which handles the Genesis home console, and Della Femina, McNamee, which has the portable Game Gear account.

The review follows the arrival earlier this year of Edward A. Volkwein as senior VP-marketing. He said both incumbents are included in the review.

In addition to the agency review, Mr. Volkwein has switched public relations agencies—to Manning, Selvage & Lee, Los Angeles, from Ketchum PR, San Francisco. Other specific marketing assignments have gone to a variety of agencies.

Mr. Volkwein assigned sales promotion to the Strottman Group, Irvine, Calif.; sports promotion to deGroot & Carlucci, White Plains, N.Y.; and licensing to Scanlan-Drosnes, Westport, Conn.

Mr. Volkwein said he isn't opposed to using a media buying service, allowing smaller agencies to participate in the review for creative. Buying is currently handled by the incumbents.

Four or five finalists will be asked for creative presentations (for which the agencies will be compensated) in June, with a decision scheduled for early July, he said. □

Y&R media chief departs

Farella's exit adds to questions on agency's direction

By Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—The sudden departure of Steve Farella as media director at Young & Rubicam is the most recent change in a series of lurches and false starts for the agency's media department.

Y&R issued a terse, four-paragraph statement last week that said the agency and Mr. Farella "would part company by mutual agreement."

But Mr. Farella's departure, coupled with a series of recent management shifts and power struggles throughout Y&R, have executives inside and outside the agency wondering about the shop's overall direction.

Another senior Y&R executive, Vice Chairman-Worldwide Director of Marketing George Guimaraes, 47, left the agency last week to join Bloom FCA as chairman-ceo of the New York office, a vacant post.

Mr. Guimaraes, who spent more than 20 years at Y&R, had lost much of his new-business responsibilities to New Business Director James Hood following a management restructuring earlier this year.

But Mr. Farella isn't leaving for another position.

Several Y&R executives said Mr. Farella, 36, was frustrated by a lack of support from agency management, who refused to back him on some key changes he proposed for the media department.

Mr. Farella was hired by the agency last July from Wells Rich Greene BDDP, where he was exec VP-director of media services.

He succeeded Gary Pranzo, who was named deputy worldwide media director of Y&R but was recently forced out of that role and is now serving as a consultant to the agency.

Mr. Farella "didn't mesh with the culture," said a former Y&R media executive. "It was a palace revolution, where the people reporting to him really did not want to report to him. And some of the people who brought him in were not there anymore or in the same positions."

Steve Farella is out after less than a year at Y&R.

Mr. Farella was hired by Joseph De Deo and John McGarry, who at the time were president of Y&R Advertising USA and president of Y&R's New York office, respectively.

In January, Mr. De Deo was moved to chairman-chief creative officer of Y&R Inc. and Mr. McGarry to president-ceo, Y&R Advertising North America.

Mr. Farella is said to have had conflicts over the department's operations with Frank Anfield, who succeeded Mr. McGarry as president of Y&R New York and to whom Mr. Farella reported.

"There was an incredible amount of tension there," said a publishing executive who requested anonymity.

The agency said all media planning, buying and research department heads will report to Mr. Anfield on day-to-day operations and to Worldwide Media Director Chris Dickens on media matters until Mr. Farella's successor is named. □

MasterCard seeks soccer shop

By Gary Levin

MasterCard International is seeking an agency to handle a global campaign promoting its 1994 World Cup soccer sponsorship.

President-CEO Alex W. "Pete" Hart described the search as a "separate but concurrent activity" with the credit card marketer's review of its $60 million U.S. account, now at Lintas:New York.

But the World Cup assignment could be nearly as lucrative, at least in the short term. MasterCard last week signed Brazilian soccer star Pele as part of a $75 million worldwide package that includes the cost of advertising, promotions, publicity and event marketing support through 1994.

"I don't know who else is known worldwide by a four-letter word; it's not George" Bush, Mr. Hart said, explaining the Pele endorsement. Under terms of the contract, Pele can't endorse any other World Cup sponsor.

The World Cup championship will be played in the U.S. for the first time in 1994, with 52 matches scattered among nine major markets. But MasterCard's sponsorship is most valuable overseas, where the brand lacks the awareness it enjoys in the U.S. and where soccer is most popular.

"Pele internationally is very recognizable," said Mava Heffler, U.S. VP-promotions. "The impact of the association is less here" and will be promoted in the U.S. through ads prepared by the winner in the current domestic agency review.

World Cup ads that prominently feature Pele will be prepared by the winner in the overseas review and are expected to break during the third quarter of this year in Latin America, Europe and possibly other regions. Lintas:Worldwide handles MasterCard's European account, which isn't up for review and won't be affected by the World Cup assignment.

In 1994, MasterCard will promote its World Cup sponsorship both locally and nationally as part of a strategy to increase event marketing. Here, MasterCard enjoys greater awareness but is a perennial also-ran to Visa International, which invested $20 million in an Olympic sponsorship this year.

So MasterCard executives say their challenge in the U.S. is to build a leadership position by promoting the soccer sponsorship to bank issuers and using it to boost card use.

Toward that end, MasterCard plans local versions of its 2-year-old MasterValues promotion in several of the host cities. □

Suiting Dems to a T

'Rolling Stone' hits GOP in title's 1st political ad

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The Democratic National Committee may have struck youth-market gold with a page ad in an unlikely place, Rolling Stone.

The committee paid about $37,000 for the ad in the April 16 issue, offering readers a chance to buy anti-Republican T-shirts for $25 each by calling an 800 number. It's the first time the magazine has ever run a political ad.

Preliminary returns were "through the roof," said Kent Brownridge, Rolling Stone senior VP-general manager, but he wouldn't give specific numbers.

"We approached the DNC . . . after I read about Jerry Brown, with his 800-number promotions in the first Democratic debate, raising $150,000," said Mr. Brownridge, who calls himself a political independent with a distinct dislike for the Bush-Quayle duo. "I thought that even if he didn't raise that much, there was a lot of response to a single ad, and given the right mechanism, there might be a way to tap into a big market."

The Democratic committee, meanwhile, had extracted considerable press and a few dollars—without advertising—from 1991 sales of a T-shirt similar to one offered in Rolling Stone. It was looking for an effective follow-up.

"The matchup made sense," said Ginny Terzano, the committee's press secretary. "Their readership is the 'boomer' generation that we're trying to attract and that has grown frustrated with George Bush. They're potential voters who want to be active but don't know the means."

Bill Miller, a copywriter at Rolling Stone agency Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis, created the two T-shirts and the ad. Two variations of the ad ran, each featuring one of the shirts.

The shirt that resembles the committee's 1991 offering features the slogan "George Bush. The Anywhere But America Tour," playing off criticism of the president's frequent travels. The other shirt has a David Letterman-like list of 10 reasons to support the Democrats ("Jobs" makes up the first nine reasons and Vice President Dan Quayle the 10th).

A page ad in Rolling Stone, featuring one of two anti-Republican T-shirts, is paying off for the Democratic National Committee.

"We didn't do this to make a political statement, although I don't think we'd do the same thing for the Republican National Committee," Mr. Brownridge said. "The magazine just endorsed Jerry Brown for president; we are not fans of George Bush."

Ms. Terzano said no decision had yet been made as to when or whether another ad will appear.

Mr. Brownridge has hopes, though: "We probably could do it in the fall and probably will." □

K-Swiss' TV debut

Athletic shoe marketer K-Swiss last weekend broke its first-ever TV commercials, two classy b&w executions that set athletic competition to an operatic score. "What you feel for the sport, we feel for the shoes" is the theme of the 30-second spots, which will run on cable and network sports programming including Major League Baseball, America's Cup '92 and tennis coverage through June. The campaign is K-Swiss' first from Kresser/Craig, Santa Monica, Calif., which picked up the small but high-profile $5 million account in September.

Chrysler sedan launch plan seen as brand-blurring

By Raymond Serafin

Lee Iacocca's "exit" advertising this fall will help polish the departing Chrysler Corp. chairman's image, but there's debate over whether it will provide the right launching pad for the company's critical new line of midsize sedans.

Mr. Iacocca, scheduled to retire at yearend, will appear in a corporate TV spot introducing the Chrysler Concorde, Dodge Intrepid and Eagle Vision, three similar models.

But a major concern of those developing launch plans for the individual models is that the corporate effort will blur brand distinctions. Chrysler has often saved money with multibrand advertising.

Chrysler will spend an estimated $100 million to launch the models, including the corporate effort. Bozell, New York and Southfield, Mich., handles Chrysler corporate and Chrysler/-Plymouth division, while BBDO Worldwide, Southfield, handles Dodge and Campbell-Mithun-Esty handles Jeep/Eagle.

The Dodge Intrepid, lowest-priced of the three models, will be aimed at the youngest target and compete with the Ford Taurus.

"The Chrysler name completely overpowers everything they do."

Chrysler will position the Eagle Vision against import competitors such as the Nissan Maxima, while the Chrysler Concorde will go up against upscale competitors such as the Oldsmobile Eighty Eight Royale and Lexus ES300.

Much of Chrysler's marketing in the past several years has gone into developing corporate images on quality and safety, but some say that has come at the expense of brand building.

"The Chrysler name completely overpowers everything they do," said Jim Wangers, senior managing partner of Automotive Marketing Consultants. "What the company did with the minivan was a dramatic success, yet one of the nameplates that carries the minivan is about to die," referring to reports Chrysler will drop the Plymouth brand by the end of this decade.

Detroit automotive watchers say Mr. Iacocca has been concerned with how his legacy will be perceived. That's said to be a reason he won't retire until after the launches this year.

"A final Iacocca corporate effort isn't a bad thing, if it's used to pass the baton on to the new leaders," Mr. Wangers said. "If he does it right, it will give [designated successor Robert] Eaton and [President Robert] Lutz a real send-off." □

Psst: Marketers, Youngstown is waiting

By Bradley Johnson

The nation's media capital, it turns out, is Youngstown, Ohio.

Yes, adults in Youngstown spend nearly 9 hours a day watching TV, listening to the radio and reading newspapers and magazines, making them the biggest per-capita consumers of media, according to a Young & Rubicam survey of media habits in the U.S.' 209 areas of dominant influence.

Ad and media executives should be grateful for such a receptive market, says survey author Ken Sacharin, VP-media director of Y&R's San Francisco office.

On average, the survey suggests, U.S. adults devote as much time to media—about 8 hours—as they do to sleeping and working.

TV is the prime medium, getting 3 hours, 48 minutes; radio garners 3 hours, 21 minutes; and newspapers and magazines get 34 minutes and 20 minutes, respectively.

But "if there's an implication for this study, it really does just underscore that you can't approach the U.S. as a mass market," Mr. Sacharin said.

Media usage varies from 8 hours, 50 minutes in Youngstown to 6 hours, 23 minutes in Lafayette, Ind., home of Purdue University.

Why Youngstown? Mr. Sacharin speculated the old Ohio steel town's high unemployment and aging population leave residents with lots of time for media.

The study, extrapolated from such sources as Arbitron Co., Standard Rate & Data Service and the Newspaper Advertising Bureau, supports some common preconceptions.

Most notably, Mr. Sacharin said, people in the South prefer watching TV to reading. Eight of the top 10 markets for per-capita TV use are in the South and Southwest. Adults in the Greenwood/-Greenville, Miss., ADI are on top, devoting 4 hours, 39 minutes daily to TV.

At the bottom is Lafayette, where residents tune in 2 hours, 53 minutes a day.

Los Angeles, the capital of TV production, is a below-average TV market. Adults watch 3 hours, 37 minutes daily, the same as in New York.

The least variation is in radio listening, Mr. Sacharin said, varying from 3 hours, 43 minutes a day in Miami/-Fort Lauderdale to 2 hours, 34 minutes a day in Gainesville, Fla.

The South and Southwest are home to the 10 markets that devote the least time to magazines and nine of the 10 markets that spend the least time with newspapers. Adults in McAllen and Brownsville, Texas, average just 19 minutes a day with newspapers.

The top newspaper town is also in the South—Charlottesville, Va., home of the University of Virginia, where adults average 53 minutes reading papers. The market ranks second to last in TV, with 2 hours, 56 minutes.

Top magazine markets tend to be cities with a comparatively educated, affluent population. In Boston, adults spend 29 minutes a day reading magazines. But Boston's No. 1 selling magazine is TV Guide, Mr. Sacharin says. □

Though late to the party, chains savor what's on table

By Scott Hume

Ronald McDonald is leading a fast-food parade into cable TV advertising.

With McDonald's Corp.'s help, the restaurant industry is discovering cable, albeit somewhat belatedly. Although still making a small commitment to the medium, fast-food's embrace of cable appears strong and growing.

This change comes during a difficult period for the restaurant industry, when the economy has dampened its overall ad spending.

■ Procter & Gamble heads Top 15 parent company advertisers on cable nets in 1991—Page S-2.

During 1991, total measured media spending by the restaurant industry was $1.72 billion, unchanged from 1990. But spending on cable TV by the restaurant industry was up nearly 40% for the year, topping $45 million.

When broken down by brand, McDonald's topped all cable spenders for full-year 1991, spending $16.2 million, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. That was an 84.1% increase over its 1990 spending.

Many other restaurant chains also are putting faith and money into cable. Burger King cut total media spending by 25%, but increased its cable bill 5%. Long John Silver's media total was off 6%; its cable spending more than doubled. Pizza Hut increased total spending 11%, but increased cable spending at a faster rate, upping it by 18%.

Cable is still a new medium for an industry that has built its growth primarily through network, spot and syndicated broadcast TV advertising. But in 1991, restaurant industry spending on cable for the first time surpassed the amounts accorded to newspaper and outdoor advertising.

Restaurant chain and cable executives point to several reasons for the growth of cable expenditures.

One is that the tough economy has put more pressure on chains to stretch marketing budgets and find ways to differentiate themselves to consumers.

Cable offers a lower or competitive cost per thousand and has aggressively courted restaurant business with advertising/promotion packages providing that differentiation.

But the most important change has been cable's increased household penetration. Most restaurant chains are comprised of dozens of operator co-ops, and national franchisors have been unwilling to—or contractually prevented from—buying ad space that doesn't equally benefit all franchisees in all markets.

That isn't a major problem for McDonald's and other national powerhouses. But it has made cable a problematic buy for regional chains. That's changing.

"We've made increased use of cable in the past year by meeting the difficulties of doing that," says Tony Lavely, exec VP-marketing for Long John Silver's parent Jerrico. The chain is large but not national; all its systemwide advertising has to help all markets.

"We don't buy network TV because we're not really national, so some portion of the impressions are wasted," he says. "We had a fling with 'regional network' buying in 1986, but that wasn't an answer. What's attracted us to cable are its strong efficiencies vs. spot and network buys."

That efficiency allows Long John Silver's to buy a "diversified portfolio" of cable networks to cover its markets. One of its biggest deals has been with Turner Broadcasting System. In exchange for a lower cost on its buy on Turner networks, Long John Silver's restaurants have in-store displays listing the month's movie schedule on TBS.

The same schedule is included on the chain's couponed newspaper inserts. Bozell, Dallas, handles Long John Silver's advertising. "It's a pure media value for us, but our consumer research has shown very high awareness levels for the TBS listings," says Mr. Lavely.

Still, Long John Silver's has had to work to sell cable to operators.

"An absolute, fundamental tenet of our operation is that with anything we do on a systemwide basis, we guarantee to our company-owned and franchised operators more measured-media benefit than they can spot buy on their own," he says.

"Our reason for being [as a franchisor] is to offer economies of scale, and we've worked hard to document the efficiencies [of our cable buys]. We think we've put in place a cable measurement system as good as anyone's."

Fast-food chains also are heavy users of in-store premium promotions, and as the economy has slumped they have become even more important ways to differentiate and draw customers. The cable networks' willingness to package in-store promotion programs with ad sales has helped make the medium more attractive.

Spending shift sends P&G soaring atop cable list

Total ad spending in medium up 9% to $1.2 billion

By Alison Fahey

Despite reducing total media spending last year, Procter & Gamble Co. made cable TV one of two measured media to get an increase in advertising.

That boost from the nation's No. 1 advertiser helped overall ad spending on cable TV networks register a healthy 9% increase in 1991, to $1.2 billion.

Budget hikes from General Motors Corp. and General Mills—which with P&G make up cable's Top 3 advertisers as ranked by parent company rather than brand—also played a big role in that overall performance.

According to new figures reported by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, P&G in 1991 retained its top position as cable's biggest advertiser, investing $67.8 million into the six ad-supported networks monitored by LNA—Cable News Network, ESPN, Family Channel, MTV: Music Television, WTBS and USA Network.

In addition to its 17.1% hike in cable, P&G also increased Sunday magazine spending 63.9% to $4.3 million.

Moreover, the new spending figures show cable TV now holds a 5.8% share of P&G's total media budget, representing a 23% gain over the package-goods giant's share in 1990.

Indicative of P&G's commitment to cable is a deal struck in 1991 to co-produce and sponsor a new parenting series called "Your Baby and Child with Penelope Leach," which runs on cable's Lifetime network.

Under the deal, P&G spots fill half of the program's available commercial time with four of its brands getting category exclusivity as the show's official sponsors. Lifetime sells the remaining commercial time to non-competing brands.

"Clearly, we have hundreds and hundreds of hours of first-run programming [in conjunction with P&G], so there is a long-standing and increasing commitment from Procter," says Douglas McCormick, exec VP-Lifetime Television. "We seemed to have found the right formula."

Mr. McCormick says advertisers are being drawn into cable "for our enhanced value" and because cable traditionally delivers a more upscale audience than other mass media, particularly network TV.

USA Network also benefited from P&G's cable spending. "I saw a lot of increases from P&G," says John Silvestri, exec VP-ad sales for USA Network, noting that P&G and advertisers in general "were looking for efficiency and targeting and making their dollars go farther."

Mr. Silvestri says the network's ad revenue rose about 18% in 1991, about double the 9% reported by LNA. Growth came both from new dollars infused by existing clients and new advertisers, he says.

Cable sales executives are also quick to point to cable's increasing penetration levels—it's now available in more than 60% of all U.S. households—the medium's competitive pricing and the increase in quality programming as the driving forces of new business.

"With the plethora of violence, exploitation and sensationalistic [fare] there becomes an increased demand for clean-cut, advertiser-friendly programming," says Bill McGowan, senior VP-ad sales at Discovery Networks.

"Cable was insulated to a certain degree in 1991 from some of the economic softness because our [costs per thousand were] less expensive," he adds.

Among other top spenders, General Motors nudged out General Mills for the No. 2 spot, putting $32.4 million into cable, up 24.6%.

General Mills devoted $31.8 million to cable, a 16.1% gain.

Among advertisers showing significant growth in LNA tabulations were those in the entertainment and amusement category, which raised overall cable spending about 32%, to $82 million.

Haircare and snack food categories also show growth in the LNA reports. For example, the confectionery, snack and soft drink category boosted cable spending about 34% to $71 million. Another big showing came from food and food product marketers, which spent $142 million on cable in 1991, up about 15%.

Breathing a sigh of refief coming out of a tough 1991, cable sales executives say 1992 looks brighter, mostly because of an expected economic turnaround and a rebound of a depressed TV marketplace.

Already, signs of renewed life are emerging as advertisers are actively committing to the TV scatter market. In addition, cable networks fared well during the kids' upfront market, which broke early this year. In the upfront selling season, advertisers buy time as much as a year in advance to lock in prices, programs and CPM guarantees.

"The kids' market is atypical, but a very good signal," says one cable sales executive. "We've definitely gotten past the bottom."

"1992 has started out as a strong year and will continue to get stronger," says Mr. McGowan. "The second-quarter scatter marketplace is tight, virtually sold out. There will be even higher demand in the third and fourth quarters. I'm very bullish on the scenario for the rest of the year." □

Chains savor what's on table in-store marketing programs tied to cable. In 1990, Pizza Hut signed a multiyear agreement with Nickelodeon and made the channel one of its chief marketing partners.

The chain is a charter advertiser in Nickelodeon's magazine and will distribute the premiere issue free in its stores next year.

1The PepsiCo fast-food division also is a presenting sponsor of Nickelodeon Studios at the Universal Studios Florida complex in Orlando.0

Pizza Hut's most recent promotion, which began in January, offers kids meals that include a plastic cup bearing characters from the network's "Doug," "Rugrats" and "Ren & Stimpy" programs.

There's also a cup of "green slime pudding," a bright green treat that looks like the slime used to douse Nickelodeon game-show contestants.

"Kids are a very important part of our market, and our relationship with Nickelodeon has brought kids into our stores," says Pizza Hut Senior VP-Marketing Bob Perkins.

"An integral part of any media budget is that no one medium is bought to the exclusion of all else. Putting a certain percentage into cable is a sound media buy, and we've been very pleased with the results," he adds.

"You can say cable still doesn't reach everywhere . . . but network TV viewership is dropping, too."

The promotions and premiums are important, but "cable programming and reach are the most important factors, with the packaging secondary," Mr. Perkins says.

"It has helped us reach targets that are otherwise difficult to reach."

> "We're bringing added edge in the marketplace."

According to Heidi Diamond, Nickelodeon VP-marketing, "We're helping in delivering a demo they're seeking, but I think we're doing more.

"We're bringing added edge in the marketplace, and that's important.

"The difference between the chains is in the food or the price/value or the experience," she says.

"We [think] there's an added benefit to Pizza Hut in having parents and children say, 'That's the Nickelodeon restaurant. Let's go there.' "

Ms. Diamond predicts Nickelodeon and other channels will be courting the restaurant industry with opportunities for local co-ops as well as national franchisors.

Pay-Per-View Network and the 39-store Pizza Hut co-op in San Diego ran a three-week cross promotion Nov. 18 through Dec. 4 tied to the Viewer's Choice telecast of "The Judds' Farewell Concert."

Pizza Hut placed $5 coupons for the Judds telecast on 100,000 pizza boxes delivered during the promotion.

A 30-second spot promoting the telecast and Pizza Hut's local sponsorship aired 300 times on cable.

Print ads ran in local newspaper TV supplements, in TV Guide and TV Time Cable Guide.

"This was our first effort in the [restaurant] category, really a test, but we're already talking to Pizza Hut and others about similar sponsorships for movies, concerts and other events," says Hilda Chazanovitz, Viewer's Choice VP-marketing.

"The marriage of PPV and home delivery of pizza is a natural. PPV telecasts are really social occasions. Friends and families tend to gather for them," she says.

Results surpassed expectations for both partners, she says, with Pizza Hut's delivery orders above average during the three weeks before the telecast and Viewer's Choice participation in San Diego 37% above the national average. □

Trone wins Salem

Small shop steals RJR cig from Leber Katz

By Judann Dagnoli

Trone Advertising, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s behind-the-scenes agency, upstaged giant FCB/Leber Katz Partners last week by winning Salem, its first major national RJR account.

The move was announced last Friday and also includes the shift of Winston Select, a new line extension previously at Trone, to Leber Katz, New York.

While Salem spent only $10 million in 1991, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, RJR has promised to restore the brand's spending to traditional levels of about $40 million.

Leber Katz is agency of record for Winston, which was supported with $45 million in measured media spending last year. The moves are effective July 1 and "consolidate individual brand assignments," RJR said in a statement.

RJR Senior VP-Marketing David Iauco said the realignment "will help the agencies better focus on the brand for which they have primary responsibility: Camel with Mezzina/Brown, Winston with FCB/Leber Katz and Salem with Trone."

As reported, RJR has been testing ad efforts from both Trone and Leber Katz since early this year (AA, Feb. 3).

Lee Trone, president of the $70 million Greensboro, N.C., shop bearing his name, said the agency was "extremely pleased" to have won Salem.

"We've worked really hard on great creative that seems to have moved the needle for RJR," he said.

RJR has been testing ad efforts from Trone and Leber Katz since early this year.

The win is a significant boost for Trone, a major RJR resource in such projects as Camel's 75th anniversary campaign in 1988. Until now, the shop had failed to secure agency of record status for a national RJR brand.

Trone was named to handle Uptown, RJR's cigarette for blacks, until the controversial brand was pulled following a limited test in Philadelphia. The shop was also assigned Dakota, a brand said to be targeted to young females, but RJR has apparently abandoned advertising for that brand after a year in a two-market test. Spending last year was less than $1 million on Dakota.

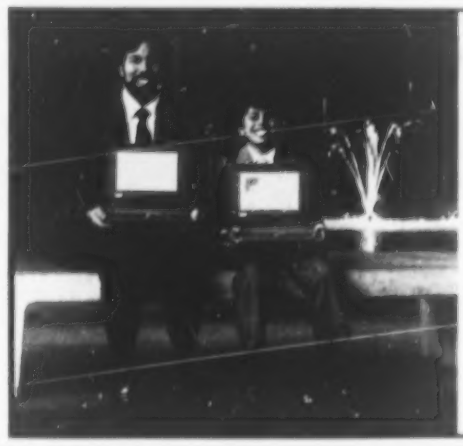
The shifts leave unchanged the $50 million assignment of Camel at Mezzina/Brown, New York, and the combined $10 million Doral, Magna, Sterling and Century business at Long, Haymes & Carr, Winston-Salem, N.C.

Vantage, RJR's other major brand, isn't being advertised and is instead supported with sales promotion efforts from Robinson & Maites, Chicago.

Initial advertising for Winston Select, now at Leber Katz, was created by Trone. It will break later this spring.

Mr. Iauco said last week's agency shifts "will put an end to speculation about what our agency plans were for our core brands."

But the retirement last year of Leber Katz chairman Stanley Katz, who has close ties to top RJR executives, is known to have diminished the agency's role at RJR. □



The Apple of dad's eye

Steve Wozniak, co-founder of Apple Computer, and his 9-year-old son, Jesse, will be seen holding Macintosh PowerBook portable computers in a magazine campaign breaking next month. Apple doesn't identify the duo, and that's just fine with Mr. Wozniak, who cut off his ponytail for the shoot. BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles, created the ad and shot some footage for a TV commercial, though it hasn't decided whether to produce a spot.

U.K. election elates admen

By Stephen Downer and Laurel Wentz

GLOBAL NEWS

LONDON—Ad executives were relieved by the surprise Conservative Party victory last week after bracing themselves for a Labor government that would have raised taxes and increased restrictions on advertising.

Agency executives were so panicked by the income tax increases outlined in the Labor Party's budget that some rushed to pay key employees a full year's salary in advance before the U.K. tax year ended April 5 to avoid the anticipated hike.

Such deals generally would involve the employee agreeing to stay for the full year and lend the money back to the company interest-free so that salary checks continue as usual.

Abbott Mead Vickers/BBDO reportedly paid salaries in advance to about 35 senior executives earning $100,000 or more. Joint Chairman-Creative Director David Abbott wouldn't confirm the reports, saying, "I'm not commenting on internal accounting."

"It's a mixture of corporate, industrial and personal relief," said Martin Smith, deputy chairman of Bartle Bogle Hegarty, after election results were in. "Personal relief because we're exactly the kind of people they were going to hit for tax. Industrial because in a recession, things are tough enough without having money taken out of the economy. Advertising is legal and appreciated by the Conservatives, but within the Labor ideology, it is viewed with considerable suspicion."

"Labor has a very prudish, almost Calvinistic, attitude toward advertising as such," said John Ritchie, deputy chairman of Collett Dickenson & Pearce, agency for Gallaher Tobacco (U.K.)'s Benson & Hedges cigarette and Hamlet cigar brands.

Labor offered national health initiatives that included banning tobacco advertising, imposing tighter controls on ads aimed at young people, toughening food labeling laws and restricting speed claims in car ads.

"From the tobacco industry's point of view, the present government has consistently opposed the proposed European Community ad ban" on tobacco advertising, said Chris Bullock, director of public affairs at the Tobacco Advisory Council.

Labor and the unions that supported the party spent an estimated $6 million on newspaper ads during the campaign's last week, almost twice the estimated Conservative spending.

Richard Hammond, VP at Bozell Europe, estimated that 80% of the U.K. business community was opposed to a Labor government.

Polls had put Labor ahead throughout the campaign. However, it appeared the Conservatives would retain a 17-seat majority in Parliament despite falling to 321 seats, a loss of 48, while Labor won 269 seats in Parliament, a gain of 38.

"Polls are better at predicting who will drink Heineken than whether people will vote Labor or Conservative," Mr. Smith said. □

Trade promos devour half of all marketing $

By Scott Hume

The shift in marketing dollars to trade promotion from media advertising appears to be real and deep.

The question now is whether it will continue.

Donnelley Marketing this week releases its 14th annual Survey of Promotional Practices, which tracks how product marketers spend their marketing dollars.

The survey's most shocking statistic is the portion of dollars channeled last year to trade promotion. Respondents said nearly half (49.5%) of their marketing budgets went to promotions and programs targeted to trade, up from 44.3% in 1990.

The rest was almost evenly split between consumer promotion programs (25.4%) and media advertising (25.1%).

That means trade promotion's growth last year came almost totally at the expense of media advertising, which in 1990 accounted for 30.6% of spending. Consumer promotion's 1990 share was 25.1%.

Trade promotion passed media advertising as the leading spending category in 1984, according to the Donnelley survey, and has steadily increased its importance since. But last year's gain was the largest percentage-point increase for any one year.

McCann-Erickson Worldwide Chairman Bob James, elected last week as this year's chairman of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, has said he intends to lead a counterattack against wasteful trade spending

Y&R cops smoke biz from PM

By Judann Dagnoli

Young & Rubicam rode into Marlboro Country last week, lassoing tobacco assignments from food client Philip Morris Cos. and leaving lead tobacco agency Leo Burnett USA riding a little less tall in the saddle.

Y&R's New York office, which already handles $210 million in food billings for Philip Morris, said it was assigned "new responsibilities in the tobacco area," including "consumer and trade promotions, special products and new-product development."

Until now, Y&R hasn't handled any Philip Morris tobacco business. Chicago-based Burnett has $120 million in U.S. tobacco business, all but the $7 million Parliament account handled by Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.

Y&R's Hispanic unit, Bravo Group, is included in the assignments.

The Y&R tobacco assignment comes six months after Y&R lost R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s $50 million Camel account.

While neither the agency nor Philip Morris would specify the nature of the new projects, it's believed one assignment is a youth-oriented, no-smoking campaign tied to Philip Morris' sponsorship of the Marlboro Grand Prix auto race in June 1993 in New York.

As part of its Grand Prix sponsorship agreement with the city, Philip Morris said it would devote one-third of its outdoor ad

How CBS got to be No. 1

By Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—When CBS teamed with mass retailer Kmart Corp. to launch its new fall season three years ago, the critics laughed and headlines smirked: "Tiffany network shops at Kmart."

But CBS executives are getting the last laugh this week as the network finishes its first prime-time season in seven years in first place.

The network's remarkable turnaround is a testament not only to CBS' strong programming but to a marketing effort that generated an unusually high level of awareness and sampling of prime-time programs.

In one year, CBS moved to first place from last in the Big 3's prime-time ratings race, finishing the 1991-92 season by a margin of 1.5 rating points over No. 2 NBC.

Though the season didn't officially end until Sunday, CBS' season-to-date prime-time ratings average through April 5 was a 13.8 vs. 12.3 for NBC and 12.2 for ABC. If anything, CBS' National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball championship coverage last week was expected to boost its prime-time average an additional 0.1 rating point.

"It's clear that CBS' marketing strategy played a significant role in attracting audiences to its programming," said Jack Myers, president of Myers Marketing & Research, which researches advertisers' perceptions of the media. "What we saw, in progressive stages over the three years of this strategy, was that the sampling was there. It grew year to year, because the promotions got more and more sophisticated. And CBS' programming held the audiences this year."

In much the same way that sophisticated consumer-product companies promote and advertise their brands, CBS used an elaborate marketing plan to position its "brands"—programs like "Murphy Brown," "Designing Women" and "Northern Exposure."

The plan began four years ago when former VP-communications of CBS George Schweitzer returned to the network after a one-year sabbatical at Young & Rubicam as VP-director of cor-

George Schweitzer's marketing plan for "brands" like "Murphy Brown," "Designing Women" and "Northern Exposure" led to CBS' prime-time payoff.

Bush ad team wish list

Puris wants to re-enlist colleagues from '88

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The Bush/Quayle re-election ad team will include some familiar faces if Martin Puris gets his way.

The Ammirati & Puris ceo is expected to be named soon as director of the media team that will create and place about $30 million in ads before Election Day Nov. 3 (AA, March 2).

Unlike 1988, when Roger Ailes was responsible for all campaign media—including ads, speeches and interviews—the 1992 campaign will see those responsibilities dispersed among several advisers. Mr. Puris, along with Robert Teeter, the campaign's chairman and chief political strategist, will have input on selection of those who will actually produce ads for the president.

Tokyo supplants N.Y. as ad capital

Slow growth trips up U.S. shops; top 500 revenue up only 2.9%

Hello, Tokyo!

The recession of 1991 that derailed the nation's economy and the U.S. advertising agency business managed to demote New York—with its fabled Madison Avenue—as the world's advertising capital.

According to Advertising Age's 48th annual Agency Report, covering more than 1,600 agencies, Tokyo agencies accounted for $24.5 billion in billings last year, up 8.4% from 1990, while New York totaled $24.1 billion, up only 3.2%. London finished third at $12.1 billion, followed by Paris at $9.7 billion and Chicago at $7.1 billion.

The slump affecting New York also left the Top 500 U.S. agencies with revenue gains of only 2.9%, to $7.7 billion on $56.2 billion in U.S. billings, actually a decline when inflation is factored in. Additionally, the figures are well off the pace of 1990's 6.2% advance from the same Top 500.

Other telltale signs of low growth at home are seen in the 3.2% reduction in the agency workforce, translating into a loss of 2,108 full-time jobs to 70,200 for the Top 500 agencies, and declining volumes in billings for each of the top five ad media.

It was on the worldwide side of the ledger that the totals showed more life. For these same agencies, worldwide gross income, the industry's terminology for revenue, improved 4.7% to $13.6 billion on billings of $96.3 billion. The worldwide total was aided by 7% growth outside the U.S., where just 21 agencies produced virtually all the group's international tally of $5.9 billion in gross income. But even this growth paled when compared with the 24.9% gain recorded in the previous year.

Advertising, like its media cousin, is making the world a global village.

Among the world's leading advertising organizations—a ranking that includes the full spectrum of agency and holding company activities—leader WPP Group, London, mixed a 2.8% gain from its largely three-tiered ad side with an 8.5% decline from the rest of its business to record a 2% drop to $2.66 billion gross income. (See chart on Page S-10.)

Interpublic Group of Cos. amassed $1.8 billion in gross income from agency networks McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Lowe Group and Lintas:Worldwide, to finish second.

Leo Burnett Co. clung to its leading position as top U.S. agency brand with domestic gross income of $299.1 million, down 0.1%. "Branding" peels away specialty businesses and autonomous subsidiaries from the conglomerate parent in order to identify the core agency pitching most accounts.

Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide remained a close second in the brand race at $286.3 million, up 3%. The agency vies for accounts independently of subsidiaries Klemtner Advertising, Rumrill-Hoyt, Cliff Freeman & Partners, Conill Advertising and Cadwell Davis Partners.

Dentsu, the world's largest single agency, generated gross income of $1.45 billion (90% of that from Japan), a strong 15.6% gain enhanced by a 7.2% rise in the yen against the U.S. dollar—the strongest growth of a major currency. Japan's 42 reporting agencies pushed gross income to $3.6 billion, up 11%, or nearly two-thirds the U.S. total, on billings of $26.6 billion, according to the international tables in this report charting activity in 46 countries.

AA does not apply current-year exchange rates to prior-year numbers, a procedure that unavoidably lowers international returns when the dollar is on the rebound as it was in 1991.

In Europe, the lira fell 2.2%, the French franc 1.6% and the deutschmark 1.3%. Using the franc as an example, a French agency's year-to-year returns had to improve 1.6% in francs to break even in dollars.

The French couldn't clear this minor hurdle, although the Germans and Italians could. The 51 French agencies posted gross income of $1.45 billion, down 4.7%, on billings of $9.4 billion. France's top three agencies each reported declines; the 54 German agencies totaled gross income of $1.07 billion, up 7.6%, on billings of $7.3 billion; 31 Italian agencies amassed gross income of $662.9 million, up 8.7%, on billings of $4.9 billion.

The 63 reporting British shops turned in gross income of $1.7 billion, up 2.2%, on billings of $12.1 billion. This growth reflected the struggling British economy and a favorable exchange rate.

Collectively, 1,110 foreign agencies from 80 countries (only 46 countries were charted) had gross income of $13.3 billion on billings of $91.2 billion. A reflection of the power of the U.S. agencies abroad is that they account for about one out of every three dollars spent by agencies.

These foreign billings in general sustain the huge U.S.-based consolidated networks led again by Young & Rubicam with gross income of $980.8 million worldwide, down 2.1%, on billings of $7.3 billion.

Consolidated agency McCann-Erickson Worldwide got 7.4% growth from its international sector; BBDO Worldwide, 13.4%; DDB Needham Worldwide, 19.7%; Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, 23.7%; Leo Burnett Co., 19.4%; Lowe Group, 20.1%; Bozell, 13.6%; and J. Walter Thompson Co., 12.1%.

The trend wasn't favorable to all. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide's non-U.S. results actually declined by 1.4%, largely from a 4.6% slide in its London

Wieden & Kennedy: Keeping ad game fresh

By Cleveland Horton

For its artistry in generating and maintaining creative momentum during an economic recession, Wieden & Kennedy has been selected Advertising Age's Agency of the Year for 1991.

In honoring the breakthrough creative work produced by this 10-year-old Portland, Ore.-based agency, Ad Age returns to its Agency of the Year annual tradition. A year ago, when Ad Age's editors felt there was no "clear superiority" or a "dominant 'creative breakthrough' for all to gawk at and admire," there was no Agency of the Year for 1990.

Wieden & Kennedy—the third consecutive West Coast agency to win Ad Age's top creative honor—goes to great lengths to promote an anti-establishment image. And in a year when few blockbuster campaigns flickered across TV screens or leaped off the printed page, the agency was able to manifest that same quality in the brilliant campaigns it produced.

It seems as though 1991, with its recession-riddled ad budgets, corporate downsizing and grim, fight-for-survival mood, served to highlight Wieden's special creative "voice" and helped build among consumers a special appreciation of its fresh work.

This small, independent shop continued its tradition of delivering fresh, innovative campaigns throughout 1991, raising the creative bar yet another notch. In some ways, it beat its own creative high marks by extending campaigns thought to have peaked.

For example, there's the agency's work for Nike, which from day one has been primarily responsible for Wieden's rapid growth. The Nike work has earned the agency many accolades, particularly for spots featuring two-sport phenomenon Bo Jackson.

But when Mr. Jackson injured his hip and found his athletic career in jeopardy, the agency came up with a credible way to incorporate the superstar's physical rehabilitation: It created a compelling piece for Nike cross-training shoes.

Meanwhile, Wieden won the Subaru of America account last year, and its first campaign for this highly visible client brought a refreshing new voice and a knowing, candid premise to automotive advertising. With the Subaru work, Wieden laid to rest any lingering notion it was a one-trick pony.

The body of its work has, to be sure, given rise to suggestions that there's now a Wieden & Kennedy "brand" of advertising. But this seeming put-down draws objections from both partners.

First, the principals refer to their work not as "advertising" but as "communication." Second, they insist each campaign is tailored to the advertiser.

"We try to communicate on behalf of all our clients," says David Kennedy, chairman and art director of the founding creative team. "We don't attempt to speak in a Wieden & Kennedy voice. We use whatever is appropriate."

However, Dan Wieden, president and copywriter, acknowledges there may be a common thread, though not a formula, to the agency's work.

"I suppose, like any good actor or actress, you end up leaving a signature on work—that is unintentional—just because of who you are," he says.

One aspect of that "signature" may be a very busy screen in TV advertising. The agency split the screen in campaigns for both Pepe Sportswear and Anne Klein's A Line clothing.

In a Pepe jeans spot, one-fourth of the screen features a spigot dripping water, while on the rest of the screen viewers see teen-agers dancing, intercut with the company's logo on a background of stylized water.

Similarly, the A Line spots divide the screen, with the voice-over's words printed in the smaller portion.

Meanwhile, in Wieden's early Subaru TV work, the voice-over scripts scroll up the right side of the screen, with certain words duplicated in larger type for emphasis.

In print, that signature may be a tone of voice accompanying an image, spoken in the language of the prospective customer.

A Nike spread, for example, shows a photo of a freckle-face teen-ager on the left page, opposite a copy block on the right.

"This is a picture of a 40-year-old woman," begins the copy in oversize type. Smaller type follows. "or perhaps just a picture of the way a 40-year-old woman feels . . . If you believe your age you might not climb whatever hills you are supposedly over. If you believe 25 or 30 or 48 or 62, you might believe it is time to stop. When you are really [then in large type] just beginning to go."

No picture of a sneaker. No reference to footwear. Just a small Nike logo in the upper right corner.

Neither partner admits to a favorite medium, but Mr. Kennedy acknowledges: "We've never been a real strong radio agency."

When pressed, Mr. Kennedy defines the agency's advertising as "having some honest, startling, refreshing communication with someone we're talking to in whatever medium. I think that's always going to be relevant. This is not about one brand or style. It's about a basic respect you have for the people you're talking to."

That sentiment is also apparent in the agency's work for Pacific First Bank, whose slogan is "We fund reality."

To dramatize that idea, Wieden created a TV spot that shows a couple in bed, the husband kept awake by the noisy party next door. As his frustration grows, video billboards, each suggesting a solution and its cost, appear: "Earplugs, $1.90," reads the first. "Sominex, $3.75." "Shotgun, $550." And finally: "New house, new neighbors, $144,800."

Whatever the agency's doing, it's working. Billings at Wieden & Kennedy keep climbing—up 63% to $165 million in 1991—and the agency, now numbering about 200 people, keeps adding staff. The Subaru win forced Wieden to open a 35-person East Coast office in Cherry Hill, N.J., bringing with it the difficulties of transporting agency culture 3,000 miles.

To make sure a certain measure of the Wieden culture would travel well, the partners sent two senior executives, David Luhr and Scot Butler, from Portland to run the office.

"We periodically do 20-minute or half-hour mini-video movies from one office to the other as a way of spreading the weirdness," Mr. Wieden says.

Future growth may come from expansion overseas, in large part to service Nike's international needs. Nike is now at the stage where it examines each campaign for its global applications. In fact, the Air 180 shoe introduction premiered worldwide last spring.

"Before I leave this place, I'd love to see us somehow successfully integrated into the small group of international advertising agencies," Mr. Wieden says. He wouldn't elaborate on how that would take place. But the partners firmly oppose any thought of selling the agency.

"After we're gone, the name of the agency's going to be Wieden & Kennedy, not Omnicom," Mr. Kennedy says. "We're trying to pass it on to the people who work here."

Mr. Wieden, 47, and Mr. Kennedy, 52, are thinking about succession within the agency, but "I don't want to talk about it in the press," Mr. Wieden says. Currently, only three people hold equity in the shop. Apart from the named partners, Dennis M. Fraser, a founder and currently director of print production, is the only other shareholder.

But as the agency has grown from a creative boutique, it's added non-creative services, as demanded by clients.

Unlike most entrepreneurs, who always knew what business they had to be in, Messrs. Wieden and Kennedy never set out to become agency executives.

"I don't think I ever wanted to be an adman," Mr. Wieden says. "My dad was Ad Age's annual selection of Agency of the Year is based on evaluation, by a committee of the publication's editors, of the creative product of the nominated agencies. Creativity, rather than size or business success, is given primary consideration to allow agencies of all sizes to compete. While nominations are made by Ad Age staff members, consideration is also given to nominations put forth by others, including the agencies themselves.

Leigh Clapham, Lintas:Sydney managing director; Geoff Wingett, Lintas:Melbourne managing director; and Max Gosling, Lintas:Australia chairman, lead the winning agency, home of deft humorous touches.

International Agency of the Year

Fresh, attention-grabbing, clear: Lintas:Australia top int'l shop

By Geoffrey Lee Martin

SYDNEY—The toddler in the crumpled green jumpsuit rolls over the edge of the couch as his feet urgently feel for the carpet. "Tranquility Base here . . . the Eagle has landed," says the teasingly familiar voice-over, recalling the first moonwalk.

The baby lets go and triumphantly staggers a few steps. "OK, Neil, you're looking good . . ." "That's one small step . . ."

Each significant move of the child is frozen for a second as a shutter whirs. Then the punch line: "Would the greatest event in the world be quite as great on anything less than Fuji film?"

Advertising such as this—fresh, attention-grabbing, compelling—is why Lintas:Australia has been chosen as Advertising Age's 1991 International Agency of the Year. The winner of the eighth annual contest was chosen from entries representing 72 agencies from 23 countries. Judging was based on creative work for campaigns breaking in calendar 1991.

Many of Lintas:Australia's ads are notable on two counts: They feature a lot of copy, reminiscent of legendary adman David Ogilvy's type-packed print ads of the 1960s, and there's often a light, deft touch of humor, almost used as a footnote.

"We consciously create advertising that includes dialogue," said Allan Crew, the agency's national creative director. "Yes, it's one of the hardest forms to get right, but when you do, it is one of the most effective."

Sophisticated yet dollar-conscious consumers in recession-weary Australia are hungry for information, Mr. Crew said.

"But in today's world, you also need to lighten up a bit, and if your message is going to be noticed, then humor is a proven, very powerful advertising tool," he said. "If you go for the gut laugh, I believe you are going to fail. What we try for is that little wry smile."

The agency doesn't set out to be the exponent of any particular style.

"There has been a trend to go toward art-directed spots by some agencies. I think we have gone the other way. We look for the story into which we can place the product," Mr. Crew said.

Two 1991 campaigns prove his point: Johnson & Johnson's Sure & Natural sanitary napkins and Honda Motor Co. cars. Both rely on strong, finger-clicking rhythm with women's bodies and cars moving in swirls of color and a touch of sex—and no words at all, just captions.

"There happens to be a similarity in the use of music and rhythm in the J&J and Honda spots, but they were done by totally different teams: J&J in Sydney, while I worked with our Melbourne team on Honda. There are people who want to turn the J&J spot into a disc, and that might well happen," Mr. Crew said.

Lintas opened in Australia in 1931 and now has 223 employees in six offices. The Ad Age accolade may surprise local competitors who still recall the mid-1980s, when the agency's reputation was in the doldrums, surviving only because of internationally aligned accounts.

Even today, Lintas' more myopic international peers talk condescendingly of the shop, 100% owned by Interpublic Group of Cos., as "a good solid agency."

But the Lintas turnaround is undeniably impressive. In a severe recession, while others stumbled, Lintas' 1991 billings jumped 9.3% to $122.1 million. Gross income rose 9.3% to $18.3 million.

The agency jumped to No. 6 last year from 10th in 1990 in national rankings, racing past other international rivals that dropped in billings or rank: Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising and Lintas' sister agency, McCann-Erickson. Lintas also passed Neville Jeffress Armstrong's.

Max Gosling, chairman of Lintas:Australia, said the "good and solid" industry reputation sits comfortably with him. "Our creative work is very good too, a lot better than some will concede—it's just overshadowed by our performance."

The agency's resurgence began about 1987, after a shakeout moved up Mr. Gosling from managing director of the Sydney shop to his current post. About the same time, Leigh Clapham joined Lintas:Australia as managing director.

"We were a new wave, very much so," Mr. Gosling said. The agency gradually built a fresh creative team and bought the majority of McSpedden Carey, a Sydney creative shop.

Mr. Clapham added: "We are committed to long-term, brand-building advertising. Too many agencies have gone for short-term fixes, especially in the '80s, trying to be dynamic and forgetting the core value of brands. But Lintas has been able to sustain long-running campaigns."

He cited Rexona and especially the sports personality campaign originated 20 years ago and now running in 25 countries. Others that are international clients with local campaigns include Unilever's Impulse body cologne and Surf laundry detergent, Sterling Winthrop's Panadol, Flora margarine and even Nestle's "Moments like these" campaigns for Minties.

International alignments are often a sensitive topic when an agency doesn't grow in the local marketplace as well.

Mr. Gosling, who's also vice chairman of Lintas:Asia Pacific, is slightly defensive: "They're important. They allow us to go and talk with possible clients, but it doesn't win us the business. You win business on your own performance."

A key example of the advantage of being strong internationally but even stronger locally is Lintas' work for Nestle Confectionery, he said.

"Lintas has business with [Nestle] worldwide, but in the past two years we in Australia have renewed our association and the relationship has become very strong," Mr. Gosling said. "We hold all the discretionary local brands . . . Nestle is giving the business to what they believe is a strong local agency."

Mr. Clapham said: "If we have an edge in the marketplace, it is our long-term commitment and passion for understanding the consumer."

Clients agree. John Creagh, marketing manager for the Australian Pork Corp., said the agency's food research work has resulted in ads producing strong results.

"In spite of the recession, we finished the year 6% up in retail sales for fresh pork," he said.

Alison Dummett, Prudential Assurance's divisional manager of marketing services, said Lintas "did a lot of work investigating the financial services field, including qualitative research."

She praised the agency's work and perceptiveness in the finance field.

Said Jon Platt, a senior writer at Lintas:Australia: "The highest-rating programs on television involve human drama . . . not special effects or clever camera work. If you take that on board and put some human warmth into your advertising, create empathy with your characters, then you will succeed.

"We are simply trying to create the best ad in each category."

That Lintas:Australia does. No accident about it. □

Independent shop networks catching on in Europe

Expansion and growth in the number of independent agency networks has paralleled the buyout frenzy that reshaped the agency and marketers' universe in the past decade.

Nowhere is this more apparent than in Europe.

Half the independent networks included in Ad Age's first listing of such global operations were formed since the mid-1980s, all Europe-based. The 15 networks in this survey comprise 452 small agencies of which 217 are in the U.S. Those agencies had collective gross income of $1.6 billion in 1991 on billings of $10.6 billion.

Independent networks provide members, generally small local shops, with broader coverage for their clients and improve their chances of sharing multinational clients that become part of the network's client pool.

U.S.-based independent networks have been around since the 1930s. In Europe, however, the growth of newly formed networks is motivated by a need to counter the consolidation taking place in the agency and advertiser communities as Europe moves closer to one market.

Mega-agency mergers that gave local advertisers a window to other national markets put pressure on the local agency without pan-European connections. At the same time, the mega-agencies also began to serve a widening number of multinational clients who bought out local clients to target new markets, according to Norval Stephens, International Federation of Advertising Agencies executive director.

Independent networks position themselves as an alternative to the bureaucratic, costly mega-agency networks.

"Local people also have equity in their agency and the agency has equity in its international network, so there is at least twice the motivation to ensure that our clients' campaigns travel well," said Berry Gelder, ceo of Interpartners Communications in Brussels.

Structures of the independent networks run the gamut. The network may be in name only with no central executive and no financial participation other than initiation fees and annual dues. Others are financially owned by members through a share structure. Some indies are known well enough among advertisers to be included in account pitches, although most are involved only peripherally through the support services they provide a member agency. □

Notes: Gross income and billings are in millions of U.S. dollars. Rank for '90 reflects advertising organization's current composition. The U.S.-based agency brands, in boldface, present only among multi-tiered holding companies, are major divisions. Companies in the Top 50 hold minority equity in each other as follows: Foote, Cone & Belding Communications owns 49% of Publicis-FCB Communications; Omnicom Group owns 46.67% of Clemenger/BBDO; Young & Rubicam and Dentsu each own 50% of Dentsu, Young & Rubicam Partnerships; Dai-Ichi Kikaku Co. owns 10.69% of FCA Group. Profiles of the Top 50 and their holdings begin on Page S-24. See Page S-20 for methodology.

operation, the network's second-largest shop. International results improved 1.3% at Lintas:Worldwide, which got flat returns from the U.K., France and Germany and a 14.6% decline from Brazil where it bought MPM Propaganda, that country's largest agency. The new cruzado's decline of 74.9% against the dollar wreaked havoc on returns of many of the large multinational agencies in Brazil.

The composition of agencies on the consolidated chart, AA's traditional chart for ranking agencies, differs from that of the Top 50 advertising organizations in that the consolidated agencies are individual segments of these advertising organizations.

Agency struggles in the U.S. have centered more on the large than the small shop. Gross income among the Top 50 U.S. brand agencies (those billing $200 million or more) grew only 1.9%, while the remaining shops increased an aggregate 4.7% (AA, April 6).

U.S. media volumes, dominated in most cases by the big shops, have taken a beating. Network TV, the leading recipient of agency billings, pulled $10.3 billion from brand agencies, down 0.8% from these agencies in the prior year. Saatchi supplanted Burnett as the No. 1 buyer, spending $809.4 million, up 3%, to Burnett's $800 million, down 10.5%.

Saatchi also remained on top in spot TV buying by spending $515.5 million, up 3%, and in consumer magazines, spending $297.8 million, up 3%.

Foote, Cone & Belding Communications wrestled the spot radio crown from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles despite being down 13.2% to $111.5 million.

Cable TV grew 11.2% and farm publications 12.1%, the only two among the 14 media monitored to gain more than 10%. □

Discs open up agency database

CHICAGO—Advertising Age has created two new software data packages for information-hungry marketing and media professionals.

Based on data compiled for this Agency Report, the discs contain domestic and international agency databases.

Agency billings figures, media breakdowns, gross income, volume, employee data, etc., covering more than 500 U.S.-based agencies are available for $600.

A database on more than 1,000 non-U.S. shops includes gross income, billings and equity investments by multinational agency networks. It also is being offered for $600. When purchased together, the total cost is $1,000.

The packages are available in popular spreadsheet and database formats.

How 'ad organizations,' agencies are ranked

This Agency Report spins numbers into three separate rankings: The World's Top 50 Advertising Organizations; the leading U.S. agency "brands"; and the top U.S.-based agencies on a consolidated basis.

Each ranking is based on gross income and equity. Gross income is revenue and includes the sum of commissions on media billings, the markup on materials and services (usually 17.65%) and fee income.

All returns from agencies or holding companies are treated on an equity basis, which allows an agency to claim only the exact percentage it owns in another.

World's Top 50 advertising organizations

The evolving corporate restructuring blurring the distinction between agencies and holding companies last year led AA to create the first ranking of the World's Top 50 Advertising Organizations (Page S-10).

Until recently, an agency was an operating company and a holding company wasn't. The former makes ads; the latter doesn't. Seems simple enough.

But the new European and U.S. configurations that emerged during the late 1980s demonstrate the difference between agency and holding company often is in name only.

A classic example of this fusion is the advertising handled by Euro RSCG principals at the holding company level. These executives pitch and manage individual accounts (France Telecom, for example) as if the executives were running an operating agency. Such business is maintained for tax reasons.

The Euro RSCG example may be extreme, but it has company. FCA Group and BDDP Worldwide are both agency and holding company. Leo Burnett Co., an operating company in the U.S., directs foreign units through an international holding company.

An ad organization qualifies for a Top 50 ranking if it owns 50%-plus of itself. It's then ranked on 100% of its equity gross income. The portion not owned can be claimed by another organization on the Top 50 chart.

The one exception to this rule is No. 23 Dentsu, Young & Rubicam Partnerships. It's a 50/50 joint venture between Dentsu and Y&R, each of which claims its 50% equity.

U.S. agency brands

The ranking of 532 U.S. agencies (beginning on Page S-24) is by agency "brand," where subsidiaries are unbundled from parent totals to get at the core agency—usually its collection of brand shops bearing the agency name.

The procedure, enabling both agency and subsidiary to be charted without duplication, in effect ranks agencies purely by advertising. Among mega-merger agencies, this means gross income stripped of contributions from specialty units such as direct response, PR, research, pharmaceutical, sales promotion or Yellow Pages.

Many advertisers don't seek a creative agency because they own specialty units that operate independently from the core agency.

To identify which ad agencies and/or specialty shops were omitted to arrive at a core shop, see footnote at the bottom of U.S.-based consolidated agencies chart (Page S-12). The units listed as part of an agency's consolidated totals in this chart were eliminated from the parent in the brand chart. The concept remains controversial, especially among multitiered agencies trying to become "seamless" despite the separate identities some of their units maintain.

Eventually, AA hopes to carry the agency brand concept into the international arena. Seeking brands on a U.S. basis presents its own difficulties, but working with agencies from 80 countries poses additional problems. U.S. agencies often are reluctant to provide returns at the subsidiary level and to concede that certain subsidiaries are autonomous.

Consolidated U.S. agencies

The ranking of the top U.S.-based agencies on a consolidated basis (Page S-12) allows the multitiered agencies to include all their subsidiaries and specialty units. A list of these varied operations is presented at the bottom of the ranking. These units also comprise the operations that were extracted to form the brand. In virtually all cases, the multitiered agency provided individual returns for each operation. No non-media activity is included in the figures.

U.S. media rankings

The Top 10 agencies in each U.S. media category (Page S-40) are ranked by their media volume at the brand level. For example, the network TV total for category-leader Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide doesn't include any TV purchased by a subsidiary.

Other notes

Exchange rates are treated historically and are based on 12 month averages compiled by AA and Thomas Cook Currency Services, Chicago. Rates for 1991 and 1990 and their percentage difference are part of the headline identifying rankings by country.

Acquisitions and divestitures are treated pro forma, as if the returns for such operations were on or off the books for two consecutive years. □

Notes: Eurocom Group and Roux Seguela Cayzac & Goudard in late 1991 merged to form Euro RSCG Group. The new operation has two advertising entities: Euro RSCG Advertising S.A., Paris, and Euro RSCG Advertising Ltd., London. The Paris holdings include the old Eurocom and RSCG networks in Europe, and the RSCG-owned agencies in the U.S. Euro RSCG generally has buyback contracts on shares held by local management, and as a result, equates such "control" as full-ownership. AA, however, includes only the equity portion held by Euro RSCG in organization totals for both years. Euro RSCG Advertising Ltd., London, is the old WCRS Worldwide network. Agencies include WCRS Group, London; Della Femina, McNamee, New York, and the Ball Partnership. It holds 60% equity in these shops. The remainder is held by Aegis Group, London. Euro RSCG Group owns 10% of Aegis Group (equity not included in Euro RSCG Group totals), a reduction from 15% in 1990. U.S. shops not listed in the profile include Corporate Graphics International, Creamer Dickson Basford and Comart Group.

Consolidation note

Agencies are shown by 100% of their returns in profiles of the World's Top 50 Agency Organizations. However, only their equity portion is included in the parent organization's totals comprising the ranking.

Notes: IPG has three major reporting units: McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Lintas:Worldwide and Lowe Group. IPG provides totals for M-E and Lintas by applying GAAP standards and not AA's equity method (see methodology, Page S-20). AA's numbers for M-E were $37.8 million lower in gross income, and for Lintas, $34.7 million lower than submitted by IPG. The treatment of M-E Hakuhodo is the major difference in M-E figures. IPG claims 100%; AA allows the actual 51% equity. No single agency dominated the Lintas markdown.

Notes: Lopex controls management finances of Alliance International network and owns controlling interest in Alliance International holding company. Agencies listed in this profile hold shares in Alliance. Lopex in turn owns varying percentages of most of the Alliance shops, including 100% of Alliance International U.K., the network's largest, and 41% of Warwick Baker & Fiore, New York, the second largest. Folded into totals are Lopex's non-advertising results of $67.2 million gross income in 1991 vs. $105.2 million in 1990, and $448 million in billings in 1991 vs. $701.7 million in 1990. This non-advertising business (all U.K. operations) includes Purchasepoint Group, a sales promotion, incentive, training agency; Design in Action; RCF, database marketing; Riley, recruitment advertising; Research Services, market research, although sold in January 1992; and the Grayling Group, a pr and lobbying unit in U.K., France, Benelux and Ireland. Lopex and Alliance severed ties with five shops in 1991. Their figures were not included in totals for both years. Three of them, Prad Alliance, Amsterdam; HVR, The Hague; and LVH, Brussels, were sold by Lopex to Publicis Communications in mid-1991. Studio Marketing, Ljubljana, Slovenia, and Brandt & Falk, Copenhagen, were dropped from the Alliance network, although Lopex never held equity in the agencies. Another Alliance agency, Publikmarket-Idea2, Milan, did not report billings. Part of the shop was sold to Omnicom, although Lopex still retains its 14.9% share. Its figures were omitted for both years. Offices and employee numbers are for the Alliance network and not Lopex's non-advertising units.

In Florida, the Tampa Bay market ranks first in population, households, retail and food store sales and the advertising vehicle that's number one in reaching adults in prime buying ages and incomes is The Tampa Tribune.

Tampa Bay's next closest newspaper comes up short in all of these categories every day of the week. Which is why, as far as advertisers are concerned, nothing beats The Tampa Tribune.

To advertise, call Joe Gess, General Advertising Manager at (813) 272-7447. Represented nationally by Sawyer Ferguson Walker, Co.

Notes: Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide is a consolidation of Kobs & Draft, AC&R Advertising and the worldwide Backer Spielvogel Bates agency network. AC&R Advertising reported to S&SAW in 1990, but swung to the BSB side in 1991 where it operates independent of BSB. The switch largely followed account alignments. Estee Lauder Inc., AC&R's largest account, is handled in international markets by BSB. AC&R, as a reporting unit of S&SAW, would have been a liability to S&SAW in its bid to get Procter & Gamble's Max Factor business last year. The switch also came after a failed attempt by AC&R management to buy back the agency. AC&R returns for both 1991 and 1990 do not include the Entertainment Division (formerly Diener/Hauser/Bates), a unit shut down in early 1991. In 1990, the Entertainment Division accounted for $11.5 million in gross income on billings of $101 million. AC&R's Irvine, Calif., shop also folded at yearend, only six months after it had regained its old name, Cochrane Chase, Livingston. BSB largely has no equity in its Latin American network, and AA does not include those returns in BSB's totals even though BSB notes 20-25% of the billings from these shops is from network accounts requiring service in the region.

Notes: The difference between organization figures of Y&R the holding company and consolidated numbers for Y&R the agency is the treatment of Burson-Marsteller. The holding company claims 100% of returns for B-M, a marketing services company, while Y&R the agency claims two-thirds, or the media-only portion of B-M. AA omits non-media activity from consolidated agencies. A 50% share of Dentsu, Young & Rubicam Partnerships, which in the U.S. includes Lord, Dentsu & Partners, New York, and Bowes Dentsu & Partners, is in Y&R returns. Figures also include Dentsu/Burson-Marsteller USA, New York, 51% of D/B-M, Tokyo, and 50% each of Russian Ventures and DWD Japan. Y&R's specialized shops included are CMF&Z, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Sive Y&R, Cincinnati, Landor, San Francisco, and in New York, Sudler & Hennessey, Chapman Direct, Arbeit/DBR, Cato Johnson Worldwide and Wunderman Worldwide. The latter two merged early this year, but their numbers remain separate in this report.

Network revenues down for '91—but how much?

NEW YORK—While Arbitron Co. reports 1991 ad revenues on the Big 3 TV networks fell 6.7% to $9.46 billion, the true level is about 12% lower than that, according to an analysis by J. Walter Thompson USA.

JWT compares Arbitron's MediaWatch findings with data from the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association, which estimates 1991 ad revenues of $8.33 billion.

While MediaWatch relies on estimates provided by the networks, the association's data are derived from the networks' unaudited submissions to accountants Ernst & Young.

MediaWatch inflates network revenues because it doesn't factor in negotiated rates or packages, and counts make-good units at regular ad rates, JWT reports.

While the absolute dollar amounts vary, JWT notes the relative shifts are about the same: "Both concluded that overall 1991 network revenues fell about 6% below 1990 levels and that daytime revenues exhibited little change from the prior year." □

Outdoor weathers '91 with stable spending

By Alison Fahey

Outdoor advertising came through 1991 in better shape than other media, seeing spending fall just 0.7% to $684 million.

The size of the decline, as reported by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, was welcome news for the industry. Some outdoor executives had feared 1990's hefty 2.4% decline, the biggest nose dive in at least a decade, would carry into 1991.

LNA reported bigger slides for other media, including network TV (off 6.7% to $9.45 billion), newspapers (down 23.1% to $6.8 billion) and network radio (down 24.5% to $578.7 million).

Spending "was flat in 1991 and, given the significant declines in other media, I think flat is a pretty good performance," said James Keller, VP-marketing at Gannett Outdoor Group, a leading outdoor company.

"In an overall down advertising industry, we've remained relatively flat, which is sort of like an increase," said Gordon Hughes, president of OAAA Marketing, a division of the Outdoor Advertising Association of America.

Mr. Hughes cited the entertainment category as one of the bright spots in the industry. Advertisers in that category increased spending about 12% to $53 million (see chart).

Among the top 10 outdoor categories, six showed declines, with the most notable drops coming from the retail, publishing and media, and insurance and real estate categories.

That's no surprise, considering each has been hit hard by the economic and/or media recessions.

One surprising finding showed tobacco-related advertisers increased outdoor spending 1.2% to $184.9 million.

The increase seemed odd because outdoor spending by those marketers has been falling for years and the outdoor industry had already voluntarily implemented restrictions on where tobacco- and alcohol-related product marketers could run their boards.

Mr. Keller questioned the LNA gain for tobacco-related products. The outdoor industry has questioned the accuracy of LNA figures and is working with its members and LNA to improve the situation.

As for the future, Mr. Keller said new spending from non-traditional advertisers would offset losses such as R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s planned outdoor spending cuts. He cited a recent buy by McDonald's Corp., the marketer's first major national outdoor campaign, as an example.

Still, it remains to be seen whether the industry will ever rebound to 1988's record $718.2 million. Outdoor ad spending has dipped every year since then. □

KGB vets spy deals

By Betsy McKay

MOSCOW—KGB agents don't die; they go to Hollywood.

A group of 500 retired spies, called the Foreign Intelligence Veterans Association, has signed a deal with the Entertainment & Communications Holdings Organization giving the Hollywood-based company exclusive rights to market some of the KGB's most hidden secrets to the entertainment world.

The organization will act as the agent for the ex-spies in selling movie and book rights to stories such as how the KGB obtained U.S. secrets about the atom bomb after World War II and Lee Harvey Oswald's relationship with the KGB. Mr. Oswald reportedly met with spy Oleg Nechiporenko two months before President Kennedy was killed.

"Profits will be divided in a fair and equitable fashion," said organization President-CEO Brian Litman. He declined to provide specifics on the commercial agreement.

Contrary to popular belief, the retired spies lead modest lives, said Anatoly Privalov, deputy chairman of the association, formed to provide financial and moral support to former spies.

"The idea that people in espionage are rich is a myth," he said.

The average pension for a former Soviet spy is between $5 and $10 a month, less than the average Russian worker's wage of $9.60. □

Perot trolls for media advice on candidacy

By Steven W. Colford

H. Ross Perot has started to explore the advertising needs that would accompany his possible run for the White House.

POLITICS ★★★★

Ray Strother, a longtime Democratic media consultant and former New Orleans adman, said he recently met with Mr. Perot to discuss how the Texas billionaire might deliver his maverick message if he enters the race.

Mr. Strother said he told Mr. Perot network, not regional, TV would be the "most efficient" way.

Mr. Strother said he spent two days in Dallas, Mr. Perot's headquarters, where he met with Mr. Perot and Thomas J. Luce III, a longtime friend of Mr. Perot.

"I talked with Mr. Luce about the difficulty of a third-party candidacy . . . and met with Mr. Perot and talked about the difficulty of getting his message out nationally," he said.

A Perot campaign, Mr. Strother said, "would be completely different" from any other in history.

"He doesn't have the conventional political wisdom that everyone else does," Mr. Strother said. "It would be completely different because Mr. Perot is so different. As a candidate, he would be bulletproof" from opponents' attacks.

"I suspect his candidacy would be very message-centered, and I suspect he would disdain the 30-second commercials and instead do the unconventional 30-minute programs and call-ins."

Mr. Perot has said he would spend $100 million of his own on a campaign, and political strategists see much of that being allocated for media advertising.

Perot

Mr. Strother said the subject of working for Mr. Perot "didn't come up" in his conversations, but that he would "probably be interested."

"I think there's a chance he could win . . . but it would be pretty hard," he said.

John Deardourff, a partner in political media consultancy Bailey/Deardourff, Falls Church, Va., has also talked to someone in the Perot camp about the feasibility of Mr. Perot's candidacy.

A Perot campaign would have "enormous potential because of the mood in the country and the extraordinary dissatisfaction with current political figures, but the system works heavily against outsiders," Mr. Deardourff said.

He also said Mr. Perot might use longer ads.

"His message would be his reputation for getting things done," Mr. Deardourff said. "I think he'd try to deliver fundamental speeches on conditions as he sees them and what he'd do about them . . . and televise them in prime time."

Mr. Deardourff in 1990 was a campaign adviser to Mr. Luce, who sought the Republican gubernatorial nomination in Texas.

Mr. Luce said he also spoke with Linda DiVall, president of American Viewpoint, Alexandria, Va., a Republican pollster.

Ms. DiVall said only that she was contacted by a Perot emissary "about three or four weeks ago" and was asked her views on Mr. Perot's chances of winning, and about the availability of "top talent" to handle the campaign. She also said the subject of working for Mr. Perot "was broached."

"I said that I was committed to seeing George Bush getting re-elected . . . and would have a hard time" working for another candidate, she said.

Mr. Perot has said he would run for the presidency if his name could be secured on general election ballots in all 50 states. To date, he's managed to get on the ballot only in Tennessee, said Susan Davidson, a Perot Committee spokeswoman, but is expected to reach his 50-state target. □

Puris

Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston. None of the three was available for comment; all, along with Mr. Puris, were involved in the 1988 Bush campaign to some degree.

"They were good people in 1988 and did good ads . . . and have experience at this," Mr. Puris said. "I'm still close with Ted and Helayne; I know they had fun in '88 and expect they'll be candidates."

Robert Gardner, president of Gardner Communications, San Francisco, is also expected to join the team. But last week, a big name in advertising took himself out of consideration.

Sean Fitzpatrick, vice chairman of McCann-Erickson Worldwide, said he will devote full attention to client General Motors Corp.'s ad needs, citing GM executive changes. Mr. Fitzpatrick had been on the Bush campaign's short list of agency people wanted for the general election.

Mr. Puris and Charlie Black, a senior Bush/Quayle adviser, envision an ad team consisting of up to four groups in different parts of the country, feeding ideas, strategy and ads to the campaign's advertising headquarters in Washington.

Mr. Puris called himself a "fan" of Mr. Ailes, who in November announced he wouldn't play an official role in the Bush/Quayle re-election effort.

"My impression is that he'll be available from time to time for the campaign," Mr. Puris said. "George Bush loves him, and I'm sure he'll be needed."

The negative ads that drew criticism of Mr. Ailes and the 1988 campaign were "blown out of proportion," Mr. Puris said. "The Democrats set the tone. And while [negative] political advertising can mislead and distort, if done properly, it is valid and can inform the public."

Although the specifics of Mr. Puris' role are still evolving, he said the time demands could be resolved with his duties at his New York agency.

"If I could do both, then at the crucial time give more time to the campaign for a few months while still doing work for my agency, I could see it," he said.

The campaign's tone is likely to be somewhere between the nasty level of 1988 and the "Morning in America" theme of President Reagan's 1984 re-election drive, Mr. Puris said.

"It will definitely be different from 1988," he said. "When you're working for someone who is just a candidate, it's like working for a product that's No. 2 or 3 in a category, and the advertising can be feisty. But if you're working for the president, then your client has to be and act as a president as well. It's a delicate line."

Mr. Puris called himself a political independent but was unabashedly proud of the chance to work on a presidential campaign.

"This is an exciting process," he said. "It's like what [BBDO Worldwide Vice Chairman] Phil Dusenberry said, there's just something about walking down the halls of the White House to present your stuff [to the president] that's pretty heady." □

Trade

and to reassert the importance of media advertising (AA, April 6).

The good news for Mr. James and ad agencies is that 43% of the respondents to the Donnelley survey projected lower trade spending in 1992, with corresponding increases in consumer promotion and media advertising. In 1991, 35% had expected a decrease.

But some observers say it may be impossible for ad agencies to reverse the flow of marketing dollars to the trade.

"This is more than a major challenge for ad agencies; this may be a sea change," said Don Schultz, a professor in the integrated communications department of Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism.

"These numbers reflect how strongly the power in the marketplace has shifted to the retailer," he said. "This is more a strategic than a recessionary shift in thinking and spending."

Last year's numbers also reflect the development of strategic alliances between manufacturers and retailers, a factor that's worked against media advertising, Mr. Schultz said.

"If I've got a deal with Wal-Mart to give them what they want to display my product, do I need to spend a lot on [media] advertising? Is display enough to keep the brand going? The jury's still out. But manufacturers are running scared right now," he said.

Among other highlights of the survey:

■ Database marketing is growing. Two-thirds of respondents said they're compiling and using consumer databases, compared with 48% in 1990. Among those building databases, mail-in premium offers and sweepstakes are the most commonly used method of information collection, followed by trackable coupons and rebates.

More than two-thirds of those using database marketing enhance their data with outside demographic and lifestyle information.

■ Trade promotion programs are also more targeted, with 87% of respondents saying they've implemented account-specific promotions for key retail customers. Most (80%) of those surveyed say they plan to increase budget allocations to these programs in 1992.

■ Ethnic-specific marketing programs are popular, with 57% conducting promotions targeted to Hispanics and 30% with promotions targeted to blacks. Overall, ethnic marketing programs account for 7% of consumer promotion budgets.

The research was conducted in October 1991, with 47 major consumer products marketers completing and returning survey forms. □

Bauer hopes to clean up with 'Soap Opera Update'

Publisher wants to buy into hot magazine segment

By Scott Donaton

Bauer Publishing Co. is negotiating to acquire Soap Opera Update and make a run at K-III Communications Corp.'s category kingpin, Soap Opera Digest.

Bauer, publisher of First for Women and Woman's World, has been conducting newsstand tests in several markets, including Rochester and Buffalo, N.Y., industry executives say, to determine ways to boost sales of Soap Opera Update.

The 4-year-old every-other-weekly is published by privately held Soap Opera Update Magazine. It has an unaudited circulation of 200,000 and is sold primarily at newsstands and supermarket checkout counters.

"We are talking with them, we are testing, but there is no acquisition yet or firm date for it," said Hubert Boehle, exec VP-chief operating officer of Bauer.

"We're in negotiations; that's all I can tell you," said Jerome Shapiro, Soap Opera Update president and publisher.

If Bauer enters the field, it will follow supermarket tabloid publisher Enquirer/Star Group, which launched the weekly Soap Opera Magazine in October.

Bauer could use Soap Opera Update to take on Soap Opera Digest.

The surge of interest in magazines covering daytime TV dramas can be traced to K-III's purchase last year of eight consumer magazines, including Soap Opera Digest, from Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. To the surprise of many, financial documents revealed Soap Opera Digest to be the most profitable title.

Soap Opera Digest, an every-other-weekly with a rate base of 1.3 million, had reported profits of $15.7 million in 1990 on revenues of $38 million. Soap Opera Digest's ad pages rose 1.6% to 420 last year, Publishers Information Bureau said.

K-III also owns the digest's sister publication, Soap Opera Weekly, which has a rate base of 500,000.

K-III has said both magazines would be profitable even without selling a single page of advertising. Soap magazines are relatively inexpensive to produce, and because the titles are sold primarily at single-copy outlets, publishers spend little on subscription acquisition efforts.

At the time of the K-III purchase, "we were called the jewels in the crown, and I'm sure many people took a look and said, 'Hey, interesting category,'" said Elaine Shindler, publisher of Soap Opera Digest and Soap Opera Weekly.

Enquirer/Star Group officials said they were unable to discuss the performance of its Soap Opera Magazine because the company is in the middle of a public stock offering. But executives close to the company said the weekly is selling between 250,000 and 300,000 copies. □

Saatchi taps Timon to oversee big piece of P&G Euro business

By Gary Levin

Clay Timon, the former worldwide ad director at Colgate-Palmolive Co., has joined Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising in Paris to run a significant piece of Procter & Gamble Co. business.

Mr. Timon, 48, has been named to the new post of regional VP for Europe, the Mideast and Africa, and will move to Paris by late May. He's responsible mainly for P&G's Ariel detergent business, a direct competitor to many of the brands marketed by Colgate. The Ariel account is estimated at more than $100 million; it's the largest advertised detergent brand in Europe.

"I've spent all my career focused on global and international" advertising, said Mr. Timon, who's held several agency posts.

The new job "is an opportunity to get back and get deeply involved with everything happening in Europe," he said, referring to the economic unification of the European Community.

Timon

"I've always loved advertising," Mr. Timon said, "and while I was not specifically looking to get back into agencies, I've been particularly wanting to spend this part of my career working in Europe and with what's going on there."

Mr. Timon "has tremendous experience in the area of getting the best creative across borders," said Edward Wax, chairman of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide. "He comes to us from a similar culture and is used to working on regional brands."

Mr. Timon left Colgate, where he was VP-director of worldwide advertising, in 1990. He later opened Clay Timon Co., a "consultancy to consultants."

Before Colgate, Mr. Timon held posts at several agencies, including Doyle Dane Bernbach (now part of DDB Needham Worldwide) and McCann-Erickson Worldwide. □

FSIs play Olympian role for A-B

'Bud Summer Games' promotion to place 220M game tix

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch will make unprecedented use of newspaper inserts as part of a $25 million Summer Olympics promotion for the Budweiser line.

The "Bud Summer Games" promotion will place 220 million game tickets in free standing inserts and in ads in magazines including Time, Sports Illustrated, People and Entertainment Weekly.

Consumers will match numbers in the inserts and ads with numbers on in-store displays.

The promotion's $8.5 million in prizes include a $1 million grand prize, Dodge minivans, Jeep Cherokees, Toshiba electronics, Kawasaki jet skis, Wilson sporting goods, Weider gym equipment, Trek mountain bikes and apparel.

The promotion starts in mid-May and coincides with A-B's corporate sponsorship of the U.S. Olympic team and NBC's Summer Games coverage. But promotion materials won't directly mention the Olympic connection.

Waylon Co., St. Louis, handles point of purchase; D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles handles advertising.

While A-B pushes the Bud Games, Miller Brewing Co. will offer "Miller Time" theme promotions via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, with POP from Louis London Advertising & Sales Promotion, St. Louis.

An inflatable-raft promotion breaks in mid-May and runs through Memorial Day, while volleyballs and T-shirts will be offered through the Fourth of July (Miller Lite is sponsor of the U.S. Olympic volleyball team). Discounts for compact discs will also be available in July.

Coors Brewing Co. earlier announced plans for a talking can promotion (AA, March 30). □

A roster of 'Tonight Show' competitors are ready to enter the fray as NBC makes room for Jay to take over from legendary Johnny

By Joe Mandese

"Heeeeeeeeeere's Johnny."

The phrase has introduced 4,531 original telecasts of the "The Tonight Show Starring Johnny Carson."

But starting next month, it will be replaced by cries of "Where's Johnny?" as millions of bleary-eyed but loyal late night viewers wean themselves off Mr. Carson and onto Jay Leno, or any of the host of other contenders for the late night talk-show crown.

"It's going to be a period of flux, both from a viewer's and an advertiser's standpoint," said Joel Segal, exec VP-director of national broadcast at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York. "NBC has a built-in following. The show will still be called 'The Tonight Show.' But it won't be the same as it was with Johnny Carson."

"Carson is a once in a lifetime situation," said Arnie Semsky, exec VP-director of media and programming services at BBDO Worldwide. "To find somebody who could be that accepted over such a long period of time is unprecedented, and we probably will never see anything like that again."

With such an act to follow, and with a large field of new competitors coming into the late night talk-show arena, buyers are naturally skeptical about NBC keeping its hold on the daypart, which it has dominated for more than 30 years.

"I think it's up for grabs," said Betsy Frank, senior VP-director of TV information and new media for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising. "There are a lot of opportunities, both for the players that are in there now and the ones that are about to enter."

Indeed, even before Mr. Carson announced his retirement last May, the competition was having an impact on the venerable series. For the 1990-91 season, the audience for "The Tonight Show Starring Johnny Carson" fell to a 4.9 Nielsen rating and 16 share, the lowest ratings in its 30-year run.

While the show's ratings are up marginally this season, the field of late night alternatives is about to grow even more crowded as Fox Broadcasting Co. re-enters the daypart with a "comedy/-talk show" starring actor Chevy Chase. And a bevy of new syndicated late night talk shows are ready to make their debuts.

The combined impact of Mr. Carson's retirement and the new competition will redistribute viewer and advertiser loyalties, Saatchi's Ms. Frank said.

"It probably will result in a redistribution of the available audience, and that will have an impact on where advertising dollars are spent," she said.

That's not good news for NBC, which is already losing share in the Big 3's $400 million late night advertising marketplace.

In 1991, NBC's share of late night network ad revenues fell 1.3 points to a 66.4 share, according to Arbitron Co.'s MediaWatch. CBS was down 1.2 points to an 11.4 share, and ABC was up 2.5 points to a 22.2 share.

For NBC, that was a smaller slice of a smaller pie, because the Big 3's late night take declined 9.2% to $397.3 million in 1991.

While part of that decline was attributable to the recession, some was money shifting to other alternatives, including syndicated TV shows like Paramount Communications' "The Arsenio Hall Show."

In 1991, late night spending on the Big 3 fell at a faster rate than other dayparts, which dropped 6.7% overall.

Key advertising categories slashed their late night network budgets last year. The No. 1 spender, imported passenger cars, was down 31.7% to $32.8 million.

Indeed, Toyota Motor Sales USA, the largest import advertiser on late night, cut its late night budget 41.5% to $11.3 million. No. 2 import car marketer American Honda Motor Co. dropped 42% to $5.4 million; No. 3 Nissan Motor Corp. USA was down 66% to $5.2 million; and No. 4 Mazda Motor of America, down 62.8% to $4.1 million.

Despite such cuts, import buyers remain upbeat about the daypart and about "The Tonight Show" in particular.

Honda agency Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, reconfirmed its second-quarter scatter buys on "The Tonight Show," said Chuck Bachrach, senior VP-director of national broadcast. Mr. Bachrach said he isn't concerned about the transition to Mr. Leno.

"We believe Jay Leno is an excellent choice, and we don't see it having a negative impact on the show," he said.

"Late night is important to us, and 'Johnny Carson' is one of the better properties in late night," said Jan Thompson, VP-marketing at Mazda. "Johnny is the only one with a large audience, and 'The Tonight Show' is a big part of our late night buy. It's always been good for us."

She said Mazda also isn't overly concerned about the late night succession, since the demographic delivery of the show might even improve.

"When [Mr. Leno] has guest-hosted, the ratings haven't fallen. He's been strong," Ms. Thompson said. "With Jay, there is the possiblity of a younger viewer. Johnny started to skew just a little older. Johnny is 40-something. Jay is 30-something. Isn't that what everyone wants today?"

Late night buyers say the daypart's ad spending cuts were due partly to its rapid growth in recent years and to the softer prices available in other dayparts, including prime time.

"Prime time is usually the bellwether, and other dayparts' relation to prime time usually determines how much money goes in there. There's no doubt that the softening of prime-time prices has caused money to move from late night into prime," said BBDO's Mr. Semsky.

As a result, late night prices have fallen significantly during the past year.

According to Ephron, Papazian, Ephron's NetCosts, prime-time household cost per thousand rose 16.3% to $8.57 in the third quarter of 1992 compared to the fourth quarter of 1991. During that same period, late night CPM fell 5.4% to $5.62.

Despite the softening of the late night market, new competitors are entering the daypart, most notably Fox.

Though Fox failed in its first foray with "The Late Show Starring Joan Rivers," which ran from October 1986 to May 1987, Fox executives believe Mr. Carson's retirement represents an irresistible opportunity to re-enter the daypart.

"It's a wonderful opportunity for us," said Jamie Kellner, president of Fox Broadcasting Co. "We tried to go up against Johnny once, and we decided it wasn't a good idea."

But Mr. Kellner said the transition to Mr. Leno will create a void among viewers, talk show guests and advertisers, and Fox plans to capitalize on that opening.

"NBC used to control late night television," he said. "They are no longer in a position to control late night advertising budgets. There no longer is one dominant player in late night television, which is wonderful for us.

"When we come in, our show will be based on its merits; what the advertisers believe the audience poten-

News briefs in print, electronic and alternative media.

Dad sues school over "Channel One." The father of an eighth-grade student filed suit against the Knox County, Tenn., school system over "Channel One." Steven Wallace, in a suit filed in U.S. District Court in Knoxville, alleged the programs and commercials on Whittle Communications' classroom TV network have no educational value and deny his son's rights. Whittle said the suit is between the parent and school board, and wouldn't comment.

Cable company sued over late fees. A $30 million class action law suit has been filed in Chancery Court in Memphis, Tenn., against Memphis Cablevision Co. by three subscribers who contend the company's $10 late fee is illegal. Attorneys for the three say they will enter an injuction plea May 27 prohibiting further assessments and collections of such fees. Dean Deyo, manager of Memphis Cablevision, said he is preparing a response that will be filed by monthend. He said $10 is a fairly common amount for late fees, which don't violate usuary law, as the suit alleges. Attorneys for the plaintiffs say the late fees are higher than reasonable given the cost of services provided, and Cablevision is being unjustly enriched by the late fees.

Event strategy. ABC Entertainment President Bob Iger said "event series" would become a regular feature on ABC's prime-time schedule. Oliver Stone's "Wild Palms" will be the first of three or four series to air during the season, he said. ABC also has committed to an event series being developed by author Judith Krantz. Event series, which air a limited number of episodes on consecutive weeks, differ from miniseries, which air on consecutive nights. "Wild Palms" will open with a 2-hour episode followed by four 1-hour episodes, Mr. Iger said.

Kids' programming at starting gate. ABC announced its Saturday morning children's programming plans. The network added three new half-hour animated series: "The Addams Family," "Goof Troop" and "Wild West C.O.W.—Boys of Moo Mesa." CBS added four half-hour animated series: Steven Spielberg's "Fievel's American Tails," "Disney's the Little Mermaid," "Disney's Raw Toonage" and "The Amazing Live Sea Monkeys." NBC announced its new Saturday morning teen programming schedule last month.

"Roseanne" solid for two more seasons. ABC negotiated a contract extension with "Roseanne" producer Carsey-Werner Co. that will keep the prime-time hit on the network for at least two more seasons. "Roseanne" was the second-highest-rated prime-time series of the 1991-92 season. □

Ad turnaround hinted

Big magazines join niche books in recovery

For the first time in more than two years, big magazines have something to smile about.

Although some smaller, special-interest magazines have fared well during the recession, larger titles are leading what appears to be the start of a comeback.

Sixteen of the top 20 in ad pages saw pages rise for the first quarter, an about-face from first quarter 1991, when 16 of the top 20 registered declines.

PIB first reported that March pages rose 0.1% from last March to 13,577, marking the second consecutive month of gains (AA, April 13). But it adjusted the numbers after discovering some magazines had five reporting weeks in March this year, up from four weeks last year. With that factored in, pages actually fell 3.2% for the month, PIB said.

For the first quarter, PIB-tracked magazines carried 35,873 ad pages, down 0.9% compared with the same period in 1991. First-quarter ad revenues rose 3.9% to $1.47 billion.

Larger titles are doing better because "as soon as things turn, advertisers want to . . . reach mass market," said Martin Walker, president of Periodical Studies Service, a consultancy.

"It's fair to say the first-quarter results are a sign that bottom has been hit and things are beginning to turn around," he said, "but it's too early to make any optimistic predictions for the year."

Increased spending in the top 10 ad categories also signals a likely turnaround. The top 10 categories (ranked by revenue) accounted for 25,160 pages for the quarter, an increase of 0.4%.

The No. 1 category, automotive, was up 3.02% with 3,948.3 pages. Also posting strong gains were business and consumer services (3,013.3 pages, up 23.5%) and drugs (915.1 pages, up 19.3%), a newcomer to the top 10.

Food fell the most, down 16.6% to 1,559.7 pages. No. 11-ranked cigarettes and tobacco continued its free fall with 641.1 pages, down 41.7%. The category ranked eighth for the period last year.

Magazines below PIB's top 20 had less to cheer about than the bigger books. Of the top 50 titles, only 27 saw pages rise through March. Of the top 100, only 46 were up for the quarter.

Bride's & Your New Home led all magazines after three months with 843 pages, a 4.4% increase. Business Week ranked second, up 21.1% to 727.5 pages. Forbes also

Carson legacy

tial of a great show on this emerging network is. I have no concern whatsoever about being able to sell the time we'll have in this show."

Although a final format hasn't been set for the Chevy Chase show, Mr. Kellner said it would be a "comedy show with some talk elements" that would probably air for 1 hour six nights a week (five orginals and one repeat).

Noting that Fox's planned national news programming would air at 10 p.m. (ET), Mr. Kellner said Fox is considering an 11 p.m. or 11:30 p.m. slot for the Chevy Chase show. An 11 p.m. slot would pre-empt much of the late night competition, which normally starts at 11:30 p.m. "The Tonight Show" begins at 11:35.

Aside from Mr. Carson's personality, Mr. Kellner said NBC's "The Tonight Show" will lose Mr. Carson's ability to attract the best talk show guests and interview subjects, which Fox plans to take advantage of with the Chevy Chase show.

Fox executives have been tracking a long list of personalities and performers as potential late night hosts for about four years but were waiting for the right time before proceeding, Mr. Kellner said.

"We've been monitoring the talent pretty closely, but we didn't have Chevy on our list, because we didn't think we could get him," he explained.

Fox executives tried to woo NBC's other late night talk show host, David Letterman, to launch a late night show on Fox, as did ABC. But executives familiar with Mr. Letterman's contract say he's locked up for two years.

A senior ABC executive also said Mr. Letterman has decided to stay at NBC, because he believes NBC will be purchased by Paramount Communications.

Mr. Letterman reportedly was angered when NBC passed him over and chose Mr. Leno to succeed Mr. Carson as host of "The Tonight Show."

But the ABC executive said Mr. Letterman believes Paramount executives will make suitable amends. Paramount Chairman Brandon Tartikoff previously was president of NBC Entertainment and has close ties to Mr. Letterman.

While declining to comment on Fox's negotiations with Mr. Letterman, Mr. Kellner said Fox's research indicated Mr. Chase is the ideal candidate for the new Fox show. The actor has strong appeal among younger demographics, an area where Fox has carved its programming niche, he said.

Indeed, according to data from Marketing Evaluations TVQ Services, Mr. Chase ranked higher in popularity than all the current major late night talk show personalities.

Among adults 18 to 34, Mr. Chase scored a 38 on Marketing Evaluations' Performer Q index. The Q scores are based on a personality's familiarity and popularity.

The next most popular late night personality among 18-to-34-year-olds was Mr. Leno, with a 27 Q rating.

Mr. Carson had a 25, Mr. Letterman a 24, Arsenio Hall a 23 and Dennis Miller a 20.

"Fox definitely made the right decision with Chevy Chase," said Henry Schafer, exec VP at Marketing Evaluations. Mr. Chase's "appeal is the highest among younger people. Jay Leno and Johnny Carson are most popular with the 55-plus audience."

Although Mr. Chase currently doesn't have a TV show, his popularity has been reinforced by his movies and reruns of the "Saturday Night Live" TV series, said Mr. Schafer, a former research executive at ABC.

"The old 'Saturday Night Live' shows are getting a lot of play on cable, particularly the younger-skewing cable like Nickelodeon and MTV," he said. "That exposure is reintroducing him and re-exposing him all the time to a new generation of viewers."

Mr. Kellner said Fox would be able to exploit Mr. Chase's appeal among young viewers because the network's prime-time series are most popular with younger viewers.

"We have the ability to promote a late night show as much as any network has ever had it, because the core audience is going to be 18 to 34 and 18 to 49, with a lot of male viewing. This is a perfect fit for us," Mr. Kellner said.

Meanwhile, several syndicated late night series are poised to make their debuts. Multimedia Entertainment will introduce the "Rush Limbaugh" show, and BYCA Television's "The Byron Allen Show" will be expanded to a weeknight strip from a once-a-week series.

Those new syndicated shows are going after time slots on independent TV stations and network affiliates. They join Paramount's "The Arsenio Hall Show" and Tribune Entertainment's "The Dennis Miller Show."

While NBC isn't expected to lose many "Tonight Show" clearances initially because of Mr. Carson's retirement, CBS and ABC may be vulnerable.

Although CBS has had marked gains in its late night performance with the "Crimetime After Primetime" lineup, the shows still have a relatively low ratings base. Many affiliates may feel they can do better with one of the new syndicated shows.

ABC's "Nightline" still performs well, particularly with upscale demographics, but ABC has had a hard time developing a suitable show to follow it, and there have been rumors the network might drop the news series in favor of a talk or entertainment format.

As for Mr. Leno's performance as host of "The Tonight Show," only time will tell.

Mr. Carson—drawing an analogy to speculation when he took over from hugely popular Jack Paar—once said: "They'll be saying, 'Who could follow Carson?' just like they said, 'Who could follow Paar?' Well, believe me, somebody can—and will."

But the question is, is that somebody Jay Leno? □

Purina bites back into pet food

O.N.E. lines for cats and dogs spell S-U-C-C-E-S-S over 'professional' competitors

By Julie Liesse

In the mid-1980s, upstarts like Iams Co. and Hill's Pet Products began gnawing into Ralston Purina Co.'s pet foods business. Now the top dog is snarling back.

Dog and cat foods account for 24% of Ralston Purina's sales of $7.4 billion, 40% of profits and a big chunk of corporate ego. But independently owned Iams and Hill's, a $500 million subsidiary of Colgate-Palmolive Co., were luring pet owners away from supermarkets with expensive cat and dog foods, each sold with the imprimatur of "professionals"—breeders, veterinarians and pet shop owners.

Purina saw its market-leading 25% to 30% share of the pet food market under attack.

In reaction, Purina's Pro Plan line hit shelves in pet shops and feed stores in 1985, with the coveted recommendation of top dog breeders—a now all-too-familiar ploy of Iams and Hill's and a passel of regional brands. Hill's used "veterinarian recommended" in its Science Diet logo, while Iams advertised its "special pet foods sold only at special stores."

By 1990, Purina wrote its first "prescription" for pet food sold only through vets, Clinical Nutrition Management, challenging Hill's very successful Prescription Diet.

By 1991, Hill's, Iams and other smaller brands were siphoning off more than $1 billion in pet food sales from supermarkets—representing potential additional sales of 15% to the retail outlets.

So last spring, Purina unleashed the final, critical phase of its battle plan. Wielding a marketing budget of $40 million to $50 million, the company expanded its 4-year-old Purina O.N.E. dog food to compete head to head with Iams and Hill's Science Diet but on its battlefield of choice: the supermarket.

If Science Diet could offer "lifestage" pet foods—different chows for puppies, senior dogs and overweight canines—then Ralston could offer Purina O.N.E. (Optimum Nutritional Effectiveness) in puppy, adult and Lite Dog varieties. If Iams' distinct kitten and cat foods could lure pet owners to try "special foods sold only at special places," well, Purina could go O.N.E. better with two cat food formulas, too.

Better yet, the O.N.E. products would be 20% to 25% less expensive than Iams or Science Diet—and spare the buyer a special trip to a "special store."

There were a couple of tricky parts: Retailers had to be convinced O.N.E.—now with 17 different items instead of the original two—would pay off enough to justify the additional shelf space. Then, of course, this was a recession, hardly an environment for a superpremium line.

A year later, it looks like Purina barked up the right tree.

JOHN SMITHER

In just one year, O.N.E. dog food sales alone jumped 36%, making Purina O.N.E. a $67 million business—much of the new business presumably coming at the expense of Iams and Hill's.

"What Ralston has said is that consumers have traded down from the more expensive specialty pet store brands to the high-end supermarket products, and that's where they've picked up volume for O.N.E.," said Michael Mauboussin, County NatWest Securities USA analyst.

That's great news for Purina, other pet food marketers and retailers. U.S. pet owners spend $6 billion a year on supermarket pet food. But marketers have fought for each scrap of profit; costly trade promotions and price wars have mauled the bottom line.

Insiders estimate Mars Inc. has lost millions of dollars helping its Kal Kan Foods make the Pedigree and Whiskas brand names leaders in canned pet foods. The more consumers choose superpremium, high-profit brands like O.N.E. instead of lower-price mainstream brands like Alpo and Purina Dog Chow, the more profit is available in the category.

Supermarket managers understand that and drool at getting some of that $1 billion back, too. You can now find more than 4,000 Purina O.N.E. "nutrition centers"—or sometimes a Vons, Jewel or Kroger nutrition center amply stocked with O.N.E.—in supermarkets around the country.

"Would grocery stores have accepted this kind of line four years ago? No," said Terry Block, VP-pet food marketing at Purina. "But we started thinking about how to approach this market in 1985, and with the original O.N.E. dog food, launched in 1987, we had laid a strong foundation for our success."

Purina continues to hit Iams and Hill's hard with wholesome actor Robert Urich and his golden retriever sidekick, Jake, who together pitch O.N.E. as "Second to none" on TV and in magazines. Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York, handles the account.

And the leader isn't alone in targeting Iams and Science Diet: As the Purina O.N.E. offensive rolled out, Quaker Oats Co. simultaneously relaunched its 10-year-old Cycle brand with a new "Advanced Nutrition Formula," new packaging and new comparative ads—and a slightly higher

Foundation's ad skirts tough abortion issues

Garfield

By Bob Garfield

He has a kind, handsome face and she is lovely in an unthreatening, Jane Pauley sort of way. As she pours his coffee, the soft dusty morning light bathes them in a nearly angelic glow. They're all smiles, comfortable in their sweatshirts and their lovely home, yet there is an odd emptiness to this scene.

What could possibly be missing?

The phone rings, and the husband volunteers to get it. The caller could be a direct marketer or the neighbor or Mom, but before a word is spoken somehow this couple knows that their prayers have been answered, their terrible void filled, their lives made whole.

Looking confirmingly at his wife, the husband says, "We have a daughter." Yes, it was the adoption agency. Yes, good things happen to good people.

"Last year," says the narrator, "over 50,000 women found families to adopt their unexpected children. They decided, instead of abortion, to tough it out and bring their babies into the world. They held to their belief that nothing is more precious than human life. To all those mothers, the families that adopted these children would like to say, 'Thank you.' "

The frame freezes as the new mother—now in a nursery holding her baby—looks up at her husband with an expression of love and joy, fulfillment and wonder, trepidation and awe.

Rating: ★ ★

"Life," says the announcer. "What a beautiful choice."

Soft images of a lovely couple in some ways distill—and in others obscure—the wrenching national debate over abortion.

Wow! The perfect case for adoption, distilled, crystalized and magnificently photographed in 37.2 seconds. What follows is 22.8 seconds more of direct-response pitch, flogging an 800 number and a book called "Journey to Life." But the heck with that.

By the time he's done, I don't want to order a book. I want to actually get pregnant, so I, too, can tough it out and give my baby to this beautiful and deserving lady, just so she'll look at me with her limpid blue eyes and say, "Thank you."

This euphoria lasts approximately 1 second. Then I remember that this is advertising, like those super glue spots showing men hanging by hard hats from girders and glue-repaired hammers hammering glue-repaired nails. Those are "Wow!" ads too, but they neglect to show what you get when you try to superglue your broken eyeglasses together, namely: a miraculously bonded thumb and forefinger and a broken pair of eyeglasses.

Hence the 800 number. The sponsor—the secretive Arthur S. De Moss Foundation—and the unnamed mystery admen who produced the spot need you to dial up before reality sets in. The reality is that this perfect case for adoption is just that: a perfect case, neglecting all of the not-so-pat situations which don't involve a healthy, white baby for America's Ideal Couple but which nonetheless constitute real life.

Furthermore, "What a beautiful choice" isn't so gentle, positive and non-confrontational as it first seems. While free of overt recriminations and "baby killer" talk, its heroic characterization of women who complete their pregnancies implies that women who choose abortions are therefore cowards. What pregnant woman—or girl—facing a life or death decision, needs some condescending man to tell her to "tough it out"?

Somebody on the so-called "pro-life" side of the abortion debate might not be insulted, but what becomes clear is this isn't an ad so much as a Rorschach test, in which the patient's interpretation of inkblots depends entirely on what's already in his head.

The De Moss Foundation cannot succeed if its advocacy merely separates the pro-choicers from the pro-lifers. The function of advertising, after all, is to persuade—not just to bathe sales pitches, and handsome couples, in the best possible light. □

How Burnett contended with Chicago Loop flood

CHICAGO—Wally Petersen, Leo Burnett USA's VP-communications, flew into O'Hare April 13, hopped in a cab and told the driver to take him to the Burnett building in the Loop.

"Where are you from? Another planet?" asked the surprised driver. The Loop was filling with water.

A breach in an underground tunnel system last week filled the tunnels and lower levels of many buildings with 250 million gallons of Chicago River water.

Most of the city's large agencies are located outside the Loop, and weren't affected. Although there was no flooding inside the Burnett building, operations did shut down the afternoon of April 13 at the city's request because of concerns about security and electricity in the area.

Shortly before noon, Bill Engelbrecht, exec VP-administration, took to Burnett's intercom system to ask all pregnant or disabled staffers to leave immediately. All others were advised to leave as soon as possible.

The building's emergency generator was readied in case of a power outage, but one never came.

The evacuation didn't mean that all work stopped. A group of Kellogg Co. executives and Burnett account staffers gathered up their research and moved their discussion of Kellogg's Frosted Flakes across the river to a table at Harry Caray's restaurant.

The agency's creative review committee jumped into cabs and reassembled at the Belden Stratford hotel on the city's dry North Side to evaluate new advertising for Kraft USA's Di Giorno pasta.

Focus groups on Green Giant, for which Pillsbury Co. executives were flying in, were moved to suburban Lincolnwood.

That night, the agency activated its Crisis Communications Plan to spread word Burnett would be open for business April 14. Key executives were notified first and asked to call members of their groups, who called others, and so on until all 2,300 employees had been called. □ price tag to make those retailers perk up.

The result has been the first good news for Quaker's downsized pet food division in five years. The $37 million Cycle relaunch paid off in a 25% boost in sales for its dry dog food, now a $105 million franchise.

"We're very happy with what's happened with Cycle. We see nutrition as a major long-term influence for people buying pet food, as it has been for other food products," said Doug Mills, senior VP-general manager of Quaker's pet food division.

Despite the success of O.N.E. and Cycle, Kal Kan may have bitten off more than it can chew with its category entry, Expert.

Launched about the same time, the Expert brand is broader than either Purina O.N.E. or Cycle; Expert includes not only dry cat and dog food but canned foods and dog biscuits as well.

Despite the additional products, and the promise of $50 million for marketing, Expert had total sales of about $36 million last year.

Kal Kan overreacted to Purina's expansion of O.N.E., industry executives say. While Purina tested canned foods and biscuits in one market—and pegged them as slow-moving items—Kal Kan opted to roll out its line without testing, in hopes of beating O.N.E. to market.

Kal Kan wouldn't comment on the product line.

"For the broader O.N.E. line, we knew we had a good idea from our market testing, and invested the time to introduce the right products into supermarkets," Mr. Block said.

Purina this month is out-Iamsing Iams with a new line of a lamb and rice formula foods, for older dogs and those with more delicate appetites.

Although rumors occasionally circulate about Iams moving its products into supermarkets, "We haven't seen them come this way yet," Mr. Block said. Whatever Iams does next, Purina is ready, he added.

"We were out on the edge with O.N.E. in 1987," Mr. Block admitted. "But we've had success with it, and at the same time we've been learning how to market to the specialty channel. Now we're playing in every outlet." □ to use Mr. Johnson as a spokesman created a marketing opportunity for SkyBox, said President Frank O'Connell.

"While others were holding back, we're bolting forward," he said. "We're committed to him. We believe in Magic. We're not afraid."

Mr. Johnson, who's featured in several of the marketer's trading cards, is a good spokesman, Mr. O'Connell said.

"He's a wonderful athlete and human being," he said. "He relates to children . . . and our products go to children. Trading cards and Magic represent to them dreams and aspirations."

SkyBox plans to be involved with the Magic Johnson Foundation, which promotes AIDS awareness. There are discussions about a card to promote AIDS awareness to children, Mr. O'Connell said.

"We do not believe there is any reason to hide" Mr. Johnson's medical status, Mr. O'Connell said. "We got a chance to stand out and make a statement. We're not afraid to do so."

Advertising throughout the trading card industry is expected to take off soon. The endorsement deal with Mr. Johnson could make SkyBox the No. 1 advertiser in the trading card arena. Upper Deck

"While others were holding back, we're bolting forward."

Co. recently hired Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif., to handle its estimated $5.5 million account, while Weiss, Whitten, Carroll, Stagliano, New York, was named first agency for Major League Marketing's estimated $3 million to $5 million account. Leaf and Fleer Corp. plan TV efforts in 1992, while Pro Set is seeking an agency (AA, March 9).

"The trading card arena is changing—it's going to become very advertised and promoted," Mr. O'Connell said. "At this point, it has not been a category that has been heavily advertised. It was very much limited to the collectors area. Now we're expanding out to the fan. Magic is a perfect spokesman because he is so well known."

The industry is estimated to reach $1.5 billion at wholesale in 1992, SkyBox said. Topps Co. was No. 1 with a 28% share in 1991, followed by SkyBox's 18%, the company said.

SkyBox has more than 20 lines of trading cards, including cards licensed by the National Basketball Association, National Football League and minor league baseball, as well as entertainment properties, such as Walt Disney Co., Star Trek and Marvel Comics. SkyBox is also the exclusive marketer of U.S. Olympic trading cards.

A series featuring the 1992 U.S. Olympic basketball team, which includes Mr. Johnson, will be out in June and is likely to be featured in SkyBox advertising. □ comply as well.

The independently owned Okeechobee Domino's, which has ordered its drivers not to chase Pizza Hut drivers if spotted, isn't bound by the corporate edict.

The practice has occurred infrequently, said Ginger Sherman, senior director-advertising and events for Pizza Hut, but often enough to leave a bad taste in the mouths of officials at the PepsiCo unit.

"It's too bad that Domino's feels the need to resort to bush league behavior," Ms. Sherman said.

"We've obviously made them nervous, and this is how they've responded," she said.

Domino's won't check whether franchise stores keep using the tactic, since the matter is up to the individual franchisee, said Mike Jenkins, Domino's director-national public relations.

Corporate Domino's stores were told to quit the practice in March. □

Berlin faces query on McKenzie

NEW YORK—Andy Berlin, the new president of DDB Needham Worldwide's office here, will be served with a subpoena this week regarding his relationship with the marketer of St. Ides malt liquor, attorney Russell Smith said. The rap group Public Enemy and lead singer Chuck D filed suit in U.S. District Court here last year against McKenzie River Co., alleging Chuck D's voice was used in a radio spot and promotional tape without permission. Mr. Berlin had been named in the suit because he was a McKenzie board member, but was dropped from the action when the marketer assured attorneys he wasn't involved in the spot in question and wasn't a McKenzie principal. Mr. Smith, the attorney for Public Enemy, said the subpoena was requested due to a report Mr. Berlin maintains an ownership interest in McKenzie. His previous agency, Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco, helped create earlier ads for McKenzie. McKenzie officials said Mr. Berlin had an option on shares that was bought out last year and was dropped from the board in December. Mr. Berlin said he has no involvement now with the brewer's ads; he recently received a new option to buy shares.

Hearst, Lauren at work on lifestyle magazine

By Scott Donaton and Pat Sloan

NEW YORK—Hearst Magazines and designer Ralph Lauren are negotiating to jointly launch an upscale consumer magazine that insiders think will revolve around the "lifestyle of the Ralph Lauren look."

Hearst is also working on a celebrity magazine prototype being developed by Gael Love, former editor of Hearst's now defunct Connoisseur. The celebrity magazine, Hello, was described as a cross between Vanity Fair and People, modeled after Britain's The Tatler.

Hearst Magazines President D. Claeys Bahrenburg has been strongly involved in the two projects, and at least one Hearst executive said that's created tensions between Mr. Bahrenburg and John Mack Carter, Hearst's director of magazine development.

Hearst confirmed it's talking to Mr. Lauren about a magazine concept, but details are being kept under tight wraps. Company officials said the project is moving forward, but there are no firm plans to test the magazine.

One executive familiar with the project indicated the magazine might not be tested for at least a year.

NEW YORK—It was a night of firsts for Advertising Age's seventh annual Best Awards Show.

It was the first time the show was held in New York, the first time agencies outside the U.S. were eligible for the creative awards and, consequently, the first time an overseas-based agency and client walked away with the top prize.

Some 300 guests were on hand at Manhattan's Hudson Theatre as film critics Gene Siskel and Roger Ebert presented the U.K.'s SELSE + Consortium and agency GGK London with the prize for Best TV Commercial of 1991.

The group of utilities companies won the award for its "Pablo" and "Terry" spots, featuring humorous interviews with animated animals about "creature comforts."

"Given the competition, it's a tremendous honor to be named the best of the best," said Steve DeSantis, account supervisor for GGK International, who accepted the award on behalf of the agency's London office.

"I wish all commercials were as good as the commercials that win these competitions," Mr. Ebert told Advertising Age.

Speaking of the trend toward animation, he said the technique is "terrific" because it "gives you freedom

Hungry shops still hoping to snare AmEx

As Chiat's ads get some 'fine-tuning,' Ogilvy, Y&R wait

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—When American Express Co. gave creative for its core charge-card business to Chiat/Day/Mojo last November, many agencies—including incumbent Ogilvy & Mather—said the relationship wouldn't last.

Nearly six months later, the client and agency are still together, and AmEx is said to be supportive. But O&M and Young & Rubicam continue to believe the $60 million account is destined to leave Chiat.

They see signs that give them hope. And the biggest is what they and others in the industry perceive as a flawed Chiat campaign.

Chiat's work, which features the AmEx card as a larger-than-life icon, is meant to appeal to current cardmembers, who the company hopes will use its cards more often while shunning Visa and others. But it's not always working that way.

An interview with VP-Consumer Advertising Joan Bonnette in a company publication this month reveals that AmEx has been less successful than planned at preventing current customers from turning in their cards and in finding new customers—an objective although a less specific one.

Also, while some of the executions are working—including one with a larger-than-expected dinner meeting and another with a sandtrapped golf course—others are not.

She said AmEx dumped a 1980s-style spot suggesting cardmembers have the freedom to buy anything, including a baseball mitt for a dog, specifically because prospective customers liked it but current cus-

Oldsmobile's Losh rises to GM marketing post

By Raymond Serafin

DETROIT—General Motors Corp. has signaled its intention to emphasize marketing by naming J. Michael Losh to the new post of VP-group executive for North American vehicle sales and marketing.

General managers of all of GM's vehicle-selling divisions will report directly to Mr. Losh, 45, formerly VP-general manager of the Oldsmobile Division.

The move means GM now has a top executive whose primary responsibility is to "oversee the marketing efforts of all the divisions," said Jim Wangers, senior managing partner of Automotive Marketing Consultants. "He has to make sure that the divisions find their target and stay on target.

"Every piece of communication with the public, right down to the car's styling, needs to communicate the brand's image."

Previously, divisional general managers reported directly to the president of GM, who also had responsibility for a variety of non-marketing areas, such as product development and manufacturing.

Mr. Losh's promotion comes less than three weeks after the shake-up at the top of GM that resulted in the demotion of President Lloyd Reuss and Chief Financial Officer Robert O'Connell.

Also as part of the shake-up, Chairman Robert Stempel was replaced as chairman of the executive committee by board member John Smale, former chairman-ceo of Procter & Gamble Co.

Vice Chairman John F. "Jack" Smith replaced Mr. Reuss as president and William Hoglund, who had been exec VP-worldwide automotive components, moved up to chief financial officer.

Losh

Mr. Losh's promotion was somewhat of a surprise because of Oldsmobile's recent rocky performance, but GM observers say he's been a protege of Mr. Hoglund since Mr. Losh succeeded Mr. Hoglund as general manager of the Pontiac unit in 1984.

Mr. Losh moved from Pontiac to Oldsmobile in 1989 but has been unable to turn around Oldsmobile's lagging sales.

Last summer, the division dropped "The new generation of Oldsmobile" campaign that began before Mr. Losh arrived, replacing it with an emphasis on Oldsmobile's engineering heritage. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago and Southfield, Mich., handles.

Oldsmobile's combined car and truck market share continued to slide in 1991, to 3.7% from 3.9% in 1990. Unit sales fell 14.8% to 458,124.

With the help of the new compact Achieva line, Oldsmobile's sales have leveled off this year. Through April 20, the division sold 132,816 cars and vans, a 3.6% increase over the same period a year ago.

Mr. Losh's most innovative marketing schemes at Oldsmobile have involved customer satisfaction programs, designed to be effective at bringing back customers in the long run.

Also reporting to Mr. Losh in his new post are the customer sales and service and consumer market development departments at GM.

VP Shirley Young heads consumer market development, while VP John Rock had been in charge of customer sales and service.

However, Mr. Rock, 56, was named to succeed Mr. Losh as Oldsmobile general manager, and no successor has been named for Mr. Rock.

There's been no decision on where the communications and marketing staff, headed by VP James Fitzpatrick, will fit into the GM reorganization. Mr. Fitzpatrick's staff includes Philip Guarascio, executive-in-charge of corporate marketing and advertising. □

Kool-Aid vs. colas

Kool-Aid takes on Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola in a comparative TV spot breaking this week that claims the General Foods USA soft drink has 25% less sugar than the leading colas. The new 30-second spot from Grey Advertising, New York, is one of three commercials in an estimated $23 million campaign for Kool-Aid, the No. 1 powder soft-drink mix. In the spot, which uses Claymation techniques, a mother bear shopping in a grocery store asks her young offspring to get some soda. The mother is then told by other mothers that Kool-Aid is better because of its lower price and lower sugar content than Coca-Cola and Pepsi.

Power boost for PowerAde

Coca-Cola sports drink targets Gatorade in first ads

By Alison Fahey

Coca-Cola USA in early May will serve up PowerAde sports drink with an introductory ad campaign hitting Gatorade.

Previously available only as a fountain drink, PowerAde will first roll into Birmingham, Ala.; Savannah and Augusta, Ga.; and Chattanooga, Tenn. It will be available in bottles and cans at supermarkets, vending machines, convenience stores and fitness clubs.

A Coca-Cola spokesman said PowerAde will "definitely roll into other markets later in the year" but declined to elaborate.

PowerAde, a non-carbonated drink in lemon-lime, fruit punch and orange flavors, is currently in nearly 2,000 fountain outlets.

A 30-second TV commercial claims PowerAde has 33% more carbohydrates for energy than Quaker Oats Co.'s Gatorade, which owns the $500 million sports drink category with about a 94% share. Radio supports.

"The results of the product so far haven't been especially notable, but we recognize the marketing ability of a company like Coca-Cola and take any competitive challenge seriously," said a Quaker spokesman. "We will do all we can to aggressively defend Gatorade in the marketplace."

PowerAde will be the official sports drink of the 1992 Summer Olympics, but Coca-Cola said it won't run TV spots during NBC's telecast. McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, handles.

Coca-Cola and Quaker had contemplated a strategic alliance earlier this year where Coca-Cola Enterprises, a bottling system, would distribute Gatorade, but the deal was never completed.

"These deals fall apart routinely because companies can't decide who is going to control the business," said Tom Pirko, president of Bevmark, a consultancy.

The introduction of canned and bottled PowerAde puts Coca-Cola into direct competition with Pepsi-Cola Co. as well.

Pepsi-Cola said it will expand All Sport, its "advanced formula" sports drink, to 25% of the country by late spring.

All Sport has been testing in Houston, Minneapolis and Sacramento, Calif. The product—in lemon-lime, orange, fruit punch and low-calorie lemon-lime flavors—is available only in bottles and isn't currently in fountains.

The rollout will be backed by TV, radio and print support from BBDO Worldwide, New York. The TV commercial contrasts the frenetic pace of today's athlete with sporting scenes from the 1960s, with the tagline "Change your game." □

Poll: Camel ads effective with kids

Brand recognition highest among preteens

By Gary Levin

A survey of students suggests R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s controversial campaign for Camel cigarettes is highly effective at reaching young people, especially kids under 13.

The survey was prepared and conducted exclusively for Advertising Age by BKG Youth, a research and marketing company. The survey, conducted from April 1 to 10, is based on separate questionnaires to about 325 8-to-13-year-olds and 175 14-to-18-year-olds at a representative sampling of schools across the country.

The study comes as the Old Joe campaign for Camel has drawn criticism from the U.S. surgeon general and the American Medical Association; both have charged the cartoon campaign entices kids to smoke.

Results showed that when asked to name familiar cigarette brands, 90% of the younger set named Camel; 73% cited Philip Morris USA's Marlboro, the top-selling brand.

Among teen-agers asked to recall cigarette brands, 83% listed Marlboro; 75% picked Camel. Marlboro was also the favorite brand among teen-age smokers, according to the survey.

"I was blown away by the number of [smaller] kids who could name cigarettes," said Marian Salzman, president of BKG Youth.

Although the brand recognition wasn't specifically linked to Camel ads, the younger students were asked to circle items they've seen in cigarette ads, including cowboys, clowns, camels, cartoon characters, dogs, cats and dolphins.

Camels were the top choice, picked by 94%, while 83% chose cowboys, common in Marlboro ads. Also, 33% named cartoon characters, 14% cited dogs, 10% chose dolphins and 9% named cats.

Asked to explain why Camel and its Old Joe mascot were more prevalent in the minds of younger kids than older ones, Ms. Salzman said kids stop being influenced by cartoon symbols by 11. She said they also become "more skeptical consumers" by 10 or 11.

Intentionally or not, "Marlboro has done a very effective job of marketing to teen-agers," Ms. Salzman said. The top-selling brand's use of a cowboy motif is perceived to be "cool" among teens, she said.

Tobacco marketers have said repeatedly their ad efforts aren't aimed at any non-smokers and especially not at underage smokers, but rather at adult smokers who might be persuaded to switch brands.

But critics have long complained that both the imagery and prevalence of cigarette ads can't help but appeal to youngsters. The Journal of the American Medical Association in December published studies claiming cartoon ads lead kids to smoke.

RJR said extensive coverage of the Joe Camel controversy in February issues of Scholastic and Weekly Reader magazines, circulated nationally to schoolchildren, had boosted awareness of the brand among that age group and influenced the recognition figures.

BKG said it pretested the survey among New York City private-school students, who don't get these publications, and found the same awareness levels.

And spokeswomen at both RJR and Philip Morris said awareness doesn't translate into consumption.

"Marlboro is out there," said Sheila Banks-McKenzie, director of media affairs at Philip Morris USA. "It's almost an American icon. But because you recognize a brand does not mean you are going to smoke cigarettes."

Asked about smoking, 6% of the high schoolers surveyed said they smoke regularly, and 11% said they smoke occasionally.

Of the older group, 59% said they buy their own cigarettes. And 76% expressed a brand preference, namely Marlboro, Marlboro Lights, Philip Morris' Virginia Slims, "whatever is cheapest" (an apparent reference to generics) and Camel.

About 4% of the younger group said they had tried cigarettes.

KIMBERLY MART

RJR said the findings merely bolster its argument.

"We certainly know children see ads for all kinds of adult products," said Peggy Carter, manager of media relations. "If you've got [a 75%] recognition factor and it's the fifth brand of choice, it's obviously not having an impact."

Camel is the sixth-largest-selling cigarette overall.

Asked where they most often see cigarette advertising, 46% of the younger set named outdoor boards; 37% named magazines. But 33% of the group said they see cigarette ads on TV, even though tobacco advertising has been banned from that medium since 1971.

"Kids watch so much TV that they assume everything [runs] there," Ms. Salzman said. It's also possible younger children confused TV coverage of the Camel controversy with advertising for the brand, she said.

Among the older (and presumably more widely read) group, 59% said they see cigarette ads most often in magazines, while 34% cited outdoor boards. □

Europeans buy outside goods, but like local ads

By Nancy Giges

Europeans welcome brands from other countries, but when it comes to advertising, they prefer the home-grown variety.

An exclusive Advertising Age International/Yankelovich survey finds most European consumers' favorite commercials are for local brands, even though they're more likely to buy brands from marketers based in other countries.

The findings suggest that "good advertising is a necessary but insufficient determinant of marketplace success. To be the best liked advertising in a category can carry you far down the field, but you're unlikely to cross the goal line unless many other factors in your market team have contributed to overall success," said Kevin Clancy, Yankelovich chairman.

The survey—conducted by Yankelovich Clancy Shulman and its affiliates Euroresearch, London; Recherches & Strategies, Paris; and RMM, Hamburg—assessed whether consumer buying habits have become truly global and whether consumers also like the advertising of their favorite brands.

Peter Till The Image Bank

The survey assessed whether consumer buying habits have become truly global and whether consumers also like the advertising of their favorite brands.

Brands crossing borders

The survey is believed to be the first to examine brand equity and loyalty across countries. It also probed consumers' attitudes toward their purchase of brands and their reasons for selecting brands.

Respondents in France, Germany and the U.K.—the three biggest advertising markets in Europe—named Coca-Cola as the soft drink purchased most often.

But although 32% of the French respondents said Coca-Cola was the soft drink they bought most often, the highest percentage (25%) named as their favorite commercial the award-winning spot for France's Perrier bottled water, in which a woman outroars a lion atop a mountain. Only 14% selected Coca-Cola advertising.

In Germany 14% said Coca-Cola was their primary non-alcoholic refreshment beverage. A

Betrix fights beauty giants with new line

Fragrance, body-care items will take on L'Oreal, Unilever

By Dagmar Mussey

DUESSELDORF—Betrix Cosmetic this week plans to announce it's taking on L'Oreal and Unilever with a bold pan-European launch of a new fragrance and body-care line.

The 11-item Laura Biagiotti Venezia line, named after the Italian designer, is the first significant pan-European launch by Betrix since the marketer was bought by Procter & Gamble Co. a year ago.

The launch puts Betrix squarely into the booming European fragrance category, a $4.2 billion market, and the $5.2 billion premium-price cosmetics and body-care market.

The markets are highly fragmented and often dominated by local brands. Both L'Oreal and Unilever are using acquisitions and rollouts of new brands to enter these categories.

The Betrix move is seen as a way for P&G to "become a major force in the high-price fragrance and cosmetic markets, where profits are much higher than in the detergent and diaper business," an agency source said.

Betrix has annual sales of about $200 million and has a strong skin-care and color cosmetics line in Europe with its Ellen Betrix brand.

The Venezia line includes perfume, cologne, body gel, body lotion, beauty bath and deodorant products.

How Martin sees Grand Met's global role

Grand Metropolitan, with brands like Green Giant and Burger King, is among a select tier of global marketers pushing to gain share outside its borders. Ian Martin, 56, who combines the roles of group managing director and chief operating officer of Grand Met with chief executive for the food sector and international retailing, spoke recently with* Advertising Age International *European Editor Laurel Wentz in London.

ONE ON ONE

Advertising Age: Is your ad spending worldwide increasing or decreasing?

Mr. Martin: It's going up. Our total spend on marketing is between $1.3 billion and $1.4 billion per annum. That would not include advertising franchisees pay for. We really believe, despite the fact the world's in recession, that you have to keep spending. A lot of our spending is on such things as the [Pillsbury refrigerated ready-to-bake dough products] launch in the U.K. and the Haagen-Dazs major developments in Europe. If we were to cut back, we would actually not be doing things that we ought to be doing. Our advertising will be up this year, I would think somewhere between 6% and 10%.

AA: How are you developing brands internationally?

Mr. Martin: We did a great deal of research on the Pillsbury dough products [launched recently, for example] in the U.K. The British palate for salt and sugar is somewhat different. The U.S. likes things sweeter. So you have to think locally about tailoring the brand to the local market, [but] I think the product manager's inclined to do too much local tailoring and can find the magic of the brand has gone.

AA: What about Green Giant?

Mr. Martin: Green Giant—it's called Geant Vert in France, Gigante Verde in Italy—is a tremendous brand I can see becoming truly international, with the cartoon figure. The great thing about Green Giant as a brand name is it's in tune with all the green values of ecology. We're doing all kinds of things [like] growing trials in Russia of asparagus and corn.

AA: And Haagen-Dazs?

Mr. Martin: When we bought Pillsbury, some of our advisers said we ought to sell [Haagen-Dazs]. But there was no way we were going to sell. It had $50 million sales in Japan. Now it's well over $100 million, and we are the No. 1 premium ice cream in Japan.

AA: What are you doing to expand?

Mr. Martin: The way we've entered the market is

Top agency networks:

Euro RSCG, Dentsu, McCann lead packs

By Nancy Giges

Euro RSCG, Dentsu and McCann-Erickson Worldwide are the top agency networks in Europe, the Asia/Pacific region and Latin America, respectively, according to Advertising Age International's 1991 network rankings by geographic region.

In Europe, Euro RSCG, the result of the merger of former No. 1 Eurocom and former No. 8 RSCG, racked up a commanding lead.

Euro RSCG had $837.7 million in gross income, almost double the $503.4 million of No. 2 Publicis FCB. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, with $383 million in gross income, moved up one place, compared with 1990, to No. 3, pushing Young & Rubicam down to No. 4.

Other shifts among the top 20 were Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, to No. 6 from No. 7; Lintas:Worldwide, to No. 7 from No. 9; J. Walter Thompson Co., to No. 9 from No. 11, and DDB Needham Worldwide, to No. 10 from No. 13.

In Asia/Pacific, Dentsu, with gross income of $1.3 billion, remains the No. 1 network, heading a list that saw very few shifts in position among the top shops.

The top six agency networks maintained the same rankings as in 1990. McCann moved up to No. 7 from No. 8 and South Korea's Cheil Communications jumped to No. 8 from No. 12. Australia's Clemenger/BBDO joined the list at No. 14, replacing Saatchi which didn't make the ranking.

In Latin America, Lintas' acquisition of MPM Propaganda boosted the Lintas network there to No. 2, from No. 5 in 1990. With $82 million in gross income, Lintas is nipping at the heels of sister network McCann, No. 1 with $85 million in gross income.

Lintas' jump pushed JWT to No. 3 from No. 2, but Duailibi, Petit, Zaragoza Propaganda moved to No. 4 from No. 6 and Leo Burnett Co. rose to No. 5 from No. 7. Others that dropped were O&M, to No. 6 from No. 3, and Y&R, to No. 7 from No. 4. Grey Advertising joined the list, replacing Saatchi in the No. 10 slot.

Rankings, using the Ad Age equity method, are based on gross income in dollar amounts that an agency organization derives from the region. The figures reflect the percentage of equity the network owns. Some agencies contend that ownership greater than 50% reflects control and that they should be credited with 100% of returns for majority-owned shops.

Although this philosophy is more in line with generally accepted accounting principles for reporting revenues, Ad Age believes the equity method better reflects an agency's position. But for comparison purposes, this year's regional rankings include a column of gross income totals based on generally accepted accounting principles.

Several large Japanese and Brazilian agencies were omitted because they lack offices outside their home countries.

As a group, the top 20 agency organizations in Europe accounted for gross income of $5.5 billion on billings of $37.7 billion. Gross income for the top 15 agencies in Asia totaled $3.2 billion on billings of $23.1 billion, and the top 10 in Latin America had gross income of $410 million on billings of $2.6 billion. □

Shops see unity of Latin America

By Rik Turner and Delinda Karle

Latin America is following Europe into economic unity, and both global and local ad agencies are gearing up.

McCann-Erickson Worldwide, the region's No. 1 agency network, DDB Needham Worldwide and others are restructuring or considering new affiliations in Latin America.

In Argentina, the Advertising Agencies Association has created a committee with the sole responsibility of analyzing the integration of Argentinian and Brazilian advertising.

Agencies are anticipating Mercosur, the Southern Cone Common Market, scheduled to unite the economies of Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay and Paraguay in 1994. They also see a strengthening of ties among members of the Andean Pact—Venezuela, Colombia, Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia—which want to end tariff barriers by 1995.

Agency executives believe these pacts will prompt more advertisers to do business across national boundaries and foster panregional media buying, which currently is minuscule.

According to a recent BBDO Worldwide study, panregional buys will account for only 3% to 5% of the estimated $11 billion spent in major media in Latin America in 1992.

Nevertheless, representatives from McCann's agencies in Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay, plus its associate agency in Paraguay, will huddle in Buenos Aires for three days in mid-June to find ways to handle cross-border accounts.

Two or three major corporate clients, including Coca-Cola Co., will be invited to the meeting, said Jens Olesen, McCann exec VP-worldwide and regional director, Latin America/Caribbean.

The meeting, Mr. Olesen said, is part of a restructuring program started last year. By yearend, McCann will create regional headquarters within Latin America.

Sao Paulo would be in charge of Mercosur countries; Mexico City would handle Mexico and Central America; and Caracas the Andean Pact countries.

A top executive in each region would report to Mr. Olesen. Executives in each country who now slightly higher percentage (15%) said their favorite advertising was for a German brand, Binding Brewery's Clausthaler nonalcoholic beer.

In the U.K., however, Coca-Cola was the favorite soft drink (named by 26%) and so was its advertising (19%).

"You'd think that 'favorite brand' might carry some equity, but favorite brands don't necessarily predict favorite commercials," said Amy Schafrann, Yankelovich senior VP, who helped prepare the survey.

French pick Omo spot

On the other hand, it's clear that breakthrough advertising can gain the attention of a competitor's customers "and hopefully some purchases," Ms. Schafrann said.

In France, Procter & Gamble Co.'s Ariel detergent is clearly the favorite laundry product, named by 24%. But Unilever's Omo, named the most preferred purchase by only 10%, had double the approval rating for its commercials.

A total of 22% of respondents named Omo advertising as their favorite, but only 11% selected Ariel commercials.

While there's clear evidence of global brands in detergents and soft drinks, automobile and cigarette categories are less clear; the brands purchased in these categories tend to be made within their own country.

The French like their Renaults and Peugeots, and the Germans like their Volkswagens and Mercedes-Benzes. However, the British are Ford fans.

A total of 28% of French respondents identified Renault as the last car they purchased and 16% named Peugeot—and they also liked their favorite car's TV commercials. Each company's TV spots were named by 18% of the French.

In Germany, Volkswagen and Mercedes-Benz were the purchases of choice, with 20% naming VW and 14% Mercedes. The clear TV advertising favorite was Mercedes, named by 18% of Germans.

Some 30% of the U.K. respondents said the last auto they bought was a Ford, and they liked Ford commercials best, but only slightly more (13%) named Ford over Peugeot (12%).

Among cigarettes, U.S. brands produced popular advertising. Broadcast advertising for cigarettes is virtually banned across Western Europe, though cinema commercials are allowed in Germany, and there are restrictions on print in some countries.

Respondents were asked to name their favorite print ad.

American Brands' Benson & Hedges was the most-purchased brand (19%) in the U.K. and Seita's Gauloises led in its home country, France, with 16%. In Germany, Philip Morris Cos.' Marlboro was the favorite smoke.

In contrast, the favorite advertising among most Germans (21%) was for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s Camel; among the French, it was for Marlboro; and in the U.K., ads for Silk Cut, marketed by American Brands' Gallaher Tobacco, were favored.

Advertising not memorable

Despite the mature London ad agency community, a surprising number of U.K. consumers either had no favorite commercial or couldn't remember any commercial in the categories.

A total of 75% couldn't remember or didn't have a favorite cigarette ad; 62%, a detergent commercial; 49%, a soft-drink commercial; and 34%, an automobile commercial.

Commercials had a much stronger impact in France, where only 10% couldn't remember or didn't have a favorite car commercial; 13%, a soft-drink commercial; 36%, a detergent commercial; and 43%, a cigarette ad.

This award-winning Perrier spot is tops in France, but the brand still is outsold by Coca-Cola.

Value is No. 1

Consumers said loud and clear that value for their money was the single most important factor in making a purchase decision.

The survey results revealed both striking similarities and differences among consumer attitudes toward the purchase of the brands they selected, brand loyalty and reasons why they select certain brands.

The most notable similarities among the surveyed consumers cover value and quality/trusted brand. These factors were found to be most important in selecting a specific brand.

Although it's not surprising that value is an important factor to consumers making purchases, the strength of that commitment across countries with different cultures, traditions and buying patterns is higher than might be expected.

When asked which of four statements was the single most important consideration in buying a product, 49% said "good value for the money" and 39% selected "a quality product/a brand I know and trust."

The French were the most concerned about value, with 51% citing "value," but close to half (48% each) in the U.K. and Germany also cited value as most important.

"Quality" ranked highest in the U.K., identified by 46% of respondents, and lowest in Germany, cited by 33%.

Foreign brands welcome

Less important to consumers is whether a product is readily available or made within their country. As the 12 members of the European Community prepare for a single market, officially starting Jan. 1, it appears most consumers are more than ready to buy brands from other nations.

Only 5% said it was important that "the product is made in my country." Availability also rated low: Only 7% said it was important that the product be easily located.

The survey showed U.K. consumers stand out in their commitment to specific brands and in their openness to imported brand names, particularly U.S. products.

U.K. consumers are the most loyal to a brand once they've made their purchase decision. Some 74% said they agreed that once they found a brand, it was difficult to get them to change to another.

Even when the appeal of a competitor's advertising is strong, it doesn't necessarily get consumers to buy, the results indicated.

Overall, 60% of respondents said they were reluctant to switch once they found a brand they liked. The least loyalty was shown in Germany, where a known and trusted brand name has little to no influence.

In contrast, 78% of respondents in the U.K. said a known and trusted brand strongly or moderately influences their purchase decisions.

Although U.K. consumers are the most loyal once they've selected a brand, they're not likely to see much difference between competing brands. About 70% said brands are all about the same, compared with 59% in France and 50% in Germany.

The AA//Yankelovich international brand survey, conducted between Feb. 23 and April 13, consisted of personal 5-minute interviews with 605 respondents, all at least 18 years old. They had to have viewed commercial TV in the week before the interview. Survey guidelines ensured a distribution of age, income and geography within each country.

The maximum margin of error is plus or minus 4%. Characteristics of the sample are: 50% male, 50% female across all countries; ages 18 to 24, 13%; 25 to 29, 13%; 30 to 39, 23%; 40 to 49, 20%; 50 to 59, 12%; 60 and older 19%.

The populations of the surveyed countries represent 51% of Western European consumers. □

Value tops purchase priorities

"Which of the following do you think is the single most important consideration when considering the purchase of a product?"

Germans indifferent to well-known brands

"How much does the fact that it is a known and trusted brand name influence your decision?"

Brits pledge brand loyalty . . .

"Once I find a brand, it is very difficult to get me to change brands."

. . . but are blind to brand differences

"There is usually not much difference between competing brands. They are all about the same."

Bus ads ride high in Romania

By Janice Kelly

Transit advertising is the most effective ad medium in Romania, according to a study by the Economic University in Bucharest.

In the survey, conducted in Bucharest last month, 97% of consumers said they were aware of transit advertising, compared with 92% for TV and 85% for print.

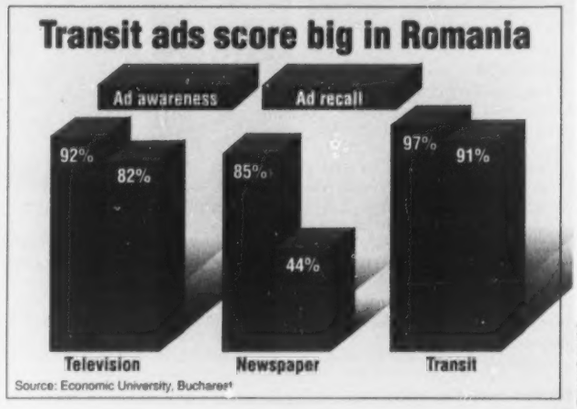
Of all the consumers surveyed, 91% said they remembered the content of the transit ad and 82% remembered TV while only 44% remembered the content of print ads.

The survey, believed to be the first on advertising awareness in Romania, is based on personal interviews with 198 consumers. The margin of error was 2% to 3%.

Transit advertising is more effective than TV because there's only one TV station, airing 30-second spots, said Kenneth Blatt, president of K.U., a New York company involved in out-of-home media placement in Romania with a local agency, Rom-K.U.

Magazines and newspapers aren't as sophisticated as Western publications and aren't as attractive to advertisers, he said.

Transit advertising is available on 200 buses. Since transit advertising became available last August, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., Colgate-Palmolive Co., PepsiCo, Rank Xerox and Philip Morris Cos. have placed ads. □



Trimmed-down 'European' goes after ads

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Since U.K. businessmen Frederick and David Barclay bought The European in January, the owners of the weekly paper have moved quickly to dismantle the overwhelming cost structure imposed by founder and former owner Robert Maxwell and to convince advertisers that it's safe to return.

GLOBAL MEDIA WORKS

After Mr Maxwell's death in November, the pan-European newspaper was on the verge of closing. The entire staff was fired and Charles Garside, now editor and general manager, persuaded former staffers to work without pay as he coaxed the paper's administrators to underwrite it week by week while a buyer was sought.

"At the end of last year, there were still some doubts about the future of The European," said Humphrey Lee, advertising display manager. "Lots of people had to make decisions about where to spend their advertising budget. We got left off many a schedule."

For example, The European and Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising helped develop an Olympics promotion for Visa International involving display advertising, wraparounds and sponsorship of a sports diary, Mr. Lee said. The lucrative package ended up going into the International Herald Tribune due to uncertainty about The European's fate, he said.

Although spring ad dollars are already committed, Mr. Lee hopes for an upturn in display advertising by fall, with classified advertising remaining healthy.

To attract more readers, The European is preparing to promote itself with an ad campaign breaking in different markets late this month.

Ads from Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide will run in national newspapers in continental Europe in May "to promote the next stage of development," Mr. Garside said. "We're looking at building each marketplace in a different way."

The European has had to absorb the cost of about 25,000 prepaid subscriptions. The paper decided to honor the subscriptions even though the money vanished into the "black hole" of the Maxwell companies' financial collapse, Mr. Garside said.

The European's costs are now about 30% of what Mr. Maxwell spent to put out the newspaper, Mr. Garside said. Under Mr. Maxwell, the paper did five different editions spread over three days and printed at five sites, including one in the U.S. He also spent lavishly to distribute the paper around the world, which has been discontinued. The European had a staff of 159, many highly paid. Mr. Garside manages with 59 people.

"The economics of printing in five centers makes no sense, and it was done without real negotiation," Mr. Garside said. "The Maxwell era is no more."

The European's guaranteed circulation to advertisers has been cut back 25% to 150,000 (85,000 on the Continent and 65,000 in the U.K.) for the first six months of 1992 and ad rates cut correspondingly to $16,600 for a b&w page and $26,500 for a color page. □

Russia looks West

Troubled newspapers seek critical joint ventures

By Betsy McKay

MOSCOW—As rising paper and printing costs claim victims in the Russian press, newspapers are turning to Western joint venture partners to help them stay afloat.

Since the price freeze was lifted in Russia in January, the cost of newsprint soared more than 10 times and distribution costs jumped more than 500%, forcing several national newspapers to cut their printing schedules. Newspapers, once able to rely on either the Soviet government or Communist Party for funding, are turning to other ventures to raise cash.

Pravda, the former official newspaper of the Soviet Communist Party, closed between March 14 and April 7. The paper was losing about $1 million and circulation had dropped to 1.4 million from 8 million in the past year.

To return to print, Pravda received a high-interest loan, Editor in Chief Gennady Seliznyov said.

Pravda is now publishing three times a week and won't return as a daily before Aug. 1. The Russian government pledged $180,000 in support, but that covers only a few days' expenses, he said.

Meanwhile, Pravda is trying to earn money from a joint venture in France that translates its news articles into a twice-monthly digest.

Another newspaper, Komsomolskaya Pravda, the country's largest daily with a circulation of 13.4 million, also scaled back to three days a week for several weeks in March but now is back to publishing six times a week.

Izvestia* will increase frequency of We/My, a joint venture with Hearst.

Considered editorially one of the country's best, the paper has faced delivery problems and for two days in March was available only in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

In late March, subscribers were asked to pay $2.87 in addition to the 27¢ they had previously paid for 1992 subscriptions, to continue their subscriptions until yearend. The hike was sought due to rising production and newsprint costs.

The paper is hoping to pull in some cash to cover its escalating production costs with an ad push for its 18-month-old quarterly supplement "Interpulse." The publication is part of a joint venture with Greenberg Baron Simon & Miller, a Denver communications consultancy, and the Providence Journal Co.

Denver-based Editor in Chief Robert Simon said a b&w page ad is $30,000.

Izvestia, the former Soviet government's official newspaper, is also seeking other ways to become financially sound. Four years ago, it became the first Soviet newspaper to accept advertising, and this June is increasing the frequency of We/My, an English- and Russian-language title that's a joint venture with Hearst Corp.

The U.S.-style full-color newspaper covers political, economic and business news about the Commonwealth of Independent States and the U.S. In the commonwealth, it sells for 3¢ and in the U.S. for $1.25.

Hearst and Izvestia are distributing about 350,000 copies in Moscow, Kiev and St. Petersburg, and 60,000 copies in 25 major U.S. markets.

Circulation could eventually reach 1 million copies a week in the former Soviet Union, U.S. Editor Maxwell McCrohon said. A b&w page is $17,000; a color page is $20,000. The first issue had six ad pages, the maximum it carries. The second had 2½ pages.

Izvestia also has a joint venture with German publisher Burda to attract Western advertisers and has run several ads from companies such as Sony Corp., Rank Xerox and Delta Air Lines. A b&w page costs $39,000. □

News briefs on print, electronic and alternative media.

Housekeeping in the morning. Good Housekeeping, published by Hearst Corp.'s National Magazine Co., London, is increasing its visibility. The Good Housekeeping Institute is the setting for 10 8-minute consumer information segments discussing everything from cordless telephones to supermarket beef to condoms. The segments are airing during Granada Television's "This Morning" magazine program through June 26. Joan Barrell, Good Housekeeping publishing director, said she expects "such massive television exposure" to result in increased circulation. Current circulation is 391,000 monthly. "This Morning" has about 4 million viewers.

Heightening awareness. DCI Editora Journalistica, a Sao Paulo newspaper and magazine publishing group, is aiming to increase advertiser and reader awareness with its first ad campaign. The publisher has named Grottera & Cia to handle a $1.5 million campaign. The group publishes Diario de Comercio & Industria, a financial daily; Visao, a newsweekly; and controlled-circulation publications including Shopping News, which goes to 500,000 households in greater Sao Paulo.

Nippon TV forecasts drop. Nippon Television Network Corp. cut its pretax profit forecast for the year ended March 31 to $112.5 million, 20% less than the previous year. A senior company official blamed the recession's effect on ad sales coupled with an increase in TV program production costs. Operating revenues were up 5% to about $1.6 billion. Pretax profits are likely to slide another 6.7% to $105 million this fiscal year, a senior managing director said.

Audit bureau spells change. The U.K.'s independent Audit Bureau of Circulations is getting tough. The 900 business press titles that want to remain bureau members must undergo an audit by the bureau's staff rather than by an outside accounting firm. Advertisers have been asking for the changes "for a long time," said John Beadell, chief executive of the audit bureau. "Everyone has to play by the same set of rules. At the moment, different interpretations of the rules are applied by accountants."

The rules will be applied to the U.K.'s 660 regional newspapers next, followed by the 500 consumer magazines and 21 national papers.

Chairman John Matthews, chief executive of Reed Business Publishing, which publishes three titles audited under the new system, doesn't see the need. "I've been in publishing for many years and I've not met a rogue publisher yet," he said. □

Advertising and circulation performance of publications.

Though ad revenue among 21 regional and international Asia/Pacific publications increased last year, ad pages fell, according to the LNA International Rome Report.

Ad revenues rose 7.3% to $153.3 million in 1991, as ad pages fell 2.4% to 17,327.2.

The study examined three categories: weekly; daily, every-other-weekly and monthly; and free distribution.

Most pan-Asian weeklies increased revenues. Yazhou Zhoukan gained the most, with ad sales up 33.1% to $8.7 million. Asiaweek's were up 20.6% to $17.9 million; Business Week, up 19.1% to $2.8 million; Far Eastern Economic Review, up 13.7% to $12.7 million; Time, up 7.8% to $29.6 million; and Newsweek, up 4.9% to $27.1 million. Only The Economist saw revenues fall, by 10.3% to $2.4 million.

Asiaweek had the biggest market share increase, 1.3 percentage points to 11.7%. Yazhou Zhoukan earned second place with a 5.7% share, up 1.1 points, and Far Eastern Economic Review ranked third with 8.3%, up 0.5 point.

Although Newsweek showed a slight increase in ad pages, its share dropped 0.4 percentage point. Rival Time showed a 0.1 point share rise.

National Geographic led the daily, every-other-weekly and monthly group with a 72.4% increase in revenues to $544,330.

The free distribution category took the biggest fall in ad revenue, with Asian Business declining 5.5% and Asia dropping 7.4%. □

Low-end clones flourish, spurred by recession

Niche marketing may be the answer for top PC brands

By Bradley Johnson

In a trend accelerated by the recession, consumers are eschewing top-tier personal computer brands in favor of cheaper clones.

"Brand loyalty has gone out the window," said Bruce Stephen, an analyst with International Data Corp., a market research company.

"Personal computers are becoming appliances," said Timothy Bajarin, exec VP at Creative Strategies Research International, a market research company. "In essence, they're just boxes pushed out the door."

As a result, IBM Corp. and Compaq Computer Corp. continue to lose share to marketers including Packard Bell and Dell Computer Corp.

IBM last year led the 9.8 million-unit U.S. PC market with 15.2%, and Compaq carried 4.1%, Mr. Stephen estimated. But that's down from 1990 unit shares of 16.6% and 4.5%, respectively, according to International Data figures. Clone marketers continue to fragment PC sales (see chart).

IBM this week is expected to decide how to enter the low-end category, either through direct-mail or sales of PCs from a different manufacturer. IBM has been considering such a move for two years; its recently established toll-free educational number has been seen as the first step in establishing low-end distribution channels.

Apple Computer is threatened less by clones than are PCs using MS-DOS-based operating systems. Its 13.6% share—up from 10.8% in 1990, according to International Data—is rising in part because of price cuts implemented on the eve of the recession.

A recent survey of Byte readers conducted by IntelliQuest showed 10% would never buy a top-tier brand, mostly because of price. To fight that, PC marketers will have to develop niches, some analysts say.

Companies will study electronics and appliance marketing to see how narrowly defined brand images can be shaped, said David Brodwin, director of computer industry consulting for Arthur D. Little Inc. There's room for a "reliable" PC label like Maytag is among appliances; a technology innovator like Sony; and a basic brand like Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s Kenmore.

"But you won't [any longer] see branding that's based on this vague fear that I couldn't figure out how to use this thing without a big company standing behind it," Mr. Brodwin said.

IBM set the stage for clone competition in the early '80s by building its original PCs with off-the-shelf parts from chip manufacturer Intel Corp. and software marketer Microsoft Corp. That made it easy for others to create cheaper clones. Today, the most popular desktop PCs are almost parity products, using Intel's 386SX chips or chip clones and Microsoft Corp.'s Windows and DOS software.

Second-tier brands are beefing up distribution and customer support, two traditional advantages of top-line brands.

For example, Packard Bell's distribution through consumer electronics stores last year moved it into the top five PC brands, some analysts say. Packard Bell last year spent $263,000 on measured media via Meade Ullman, Agoura Hills, Calif.

Dell, a pioneer in mail-order sales, last year began selling via computer discount superstores. Goldberg Moser O'Neill, San Francisco, handles Dell's $4 million-plus account, mostly print.

Dell, whose ads position the brand as a lower-price alternative to Compaq, in February agreed to pay Compaq an undisclosed amount to settle litigation over advertising. Dell admitted no wrongdoing.

Compaq, which sells through computer specialty stores, in December moved its account to Ammirati & Puris, New York, from Ogilvy & Mather, Houston. Compaq spent $12.7 million in measured media last year, mostly in magazines.

Apple has shifted funds from media advertising to direct mail and promotional programs. Last year, Apple spent $28.1 million on media, down 32% from 1990. BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles, handles advertising; Wunderman Worldwide, San Francisco, handles direct response.

IBM has also cut advertising, with measured media spending down 36% to $49.6 million last year. Lintas:New York handles IBM's PC account. □

Alan Radding contributed to this story.

Cox contemplates new information services

By Leslie Bayor

Media company Cox Enterprises is exploring new information delivery systems through its New Ventures Group.

Formed in January, the division will build on Access Atlanta, Cox's on-line service for its Atlanta Journal and Constitution.

The unit also will research information delivery methods including videotex, audiotex, compact discs and facsimile transmissions. It may offer financial planning forms on floppy disc; provide by fax complete texts of speeches and documents that run in part in the newspaper; and add on-line services including electronic encyclopedias and concert and sports ticket information.

Cox may offer on-line information related to display advertisers' categories as an added value, giving advertisers more visibility among on-line users.

David Scott, 46, is general manager and the division's only employee so far; he had been Cox Newspapers group VP.

Access Atlanta, a 20-month-old consumer information service, provides information from the paper, including stock quotes and classified ads. It may take display advertising in the future. The service has 850 subscribers; basic service costs $6.95 a month, with premium services an additional 30¢ to $2 per minute.

Cox's new services will compete directly with BellSouth Corp.'s Transtext Universal Gateway, an on-line clearinghouse for about 50 information providers. □

'Economist' tries electronic kits

Computer discs follow paper trail to agency media planners

By Scott Donaton

Electronic media kits have yet to prove themselves as a serious threat to their paper counterparts. But The Economist is betting computer kits will play a role in agency media departments.

The weekly this month began distributing computer disc media kits to agency media planners under a two-year contract with New York-based Mediapoint, marketer of the kit.

The disc can be used on both DOS and Macintosh operating systems, and provides information on The Economist's editorial calendar, ad rates, circulation, closing dates and sales contacts.

"We believe this is coming at the right time," said Willy Morgan, VP-director of advertising for the magazine, published by The Economist Newspaper Group.

Electronic media kits aren't new but have yet to gain widespread acceptance from publishers or ad agencies. Creative Media Group, Morristown, N.J., has been marketing a similar electronic media kit for several years but has only one client, Advertising Age.

Rodale Press scrapped plans to produce electronic kits last year because agencies are reluctant to use the discs—in part because few publishers offer them.

Mediapoint President Paul Benjou said the company is talking with several publishers and expects to announce new contracts soon. He said agencies will accept electronic kits if they're easy to use.

"We've attempted to set an industry standard," he said. "Planners won't [have to] learn and relearn instructions for each individual publication."

Frank Smith, VP-group director of print services for Young & Rubicam, New York, said, "Anything anybody does to . . . expedite our access to information is great."

Electronic media kits will supplement rather than replace paper kits, said Mr. Morgan. The Economist expects to distribute as many as 1,000 discs in the next year.

The kits should save money for The Economist, which spends an estimated $100,000 a year on paper kits. Mediapoint's discs are about 30% cheaper to produce, and discs not distributed one year can be updated the next. □

Network study tracks out-of-home viewing

Nielsen plans diary survey of elusive audience

By Joe Mandese

An upcoming study may bring home new facts about out-of-home viewing.

The Big 3 TV networks have launched a research initiative with Nielsen Media Research to record out-of-home TV viewing, a portion of network viewing that currently goes unmeasured.

Out-of-home viewing includes viewership in bars, restaurants, on college campuses and in the workplace.

The study, dubbed "Total Television Viewing Report: ABC, CBS & NBC," is underwritten by the Network Television Association, which estimates as many as 20 million viewers a week watch TV out of their homes.

Out-of-home viewers tend to be younger, more upscale and some of the most difficult viewers to reach, including business travelers, working women and college students living on campus.

Out-of-home viewing "can represent a significant percentage of the total viewing they do," said Steve Singer, the association's senior VP-research.

In October and November, Nielsen will ask 3,500 viewers 12 and older to record in written diaries their viewing for one week.

The data will be tabulated for every network TV show, and Nielsen will develop an index to adjust the ratings levels for a February report.

Nielsen hasn't decided whether the data will be included in its regular network reports or published separately, said John Dimling, exec VP-group director of marketing.

He said the study is an acknowledgment that Nielsen's current ratings system doesn't completely measure TV viewing. Nielsen hasn't conducted this type of research because "until recently, our clients weren't willing to pay us for this type of data," Mr. Dimling said.

He predicted the impact will be greater for some shows; for example, " 'Monday Night Football' will have a higher out-of-home audience than 'The Cosby Show,' " he said.

The findings are bound to cause a stir among advertisers, but association President Peter Chrisanthopoulos said, "I feel comfortable [advertisers are] going to use that data, and that's where the value is for [the networks]."

But Joseph Ostrow, exec VP-worldwide media director at Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, New York, said: "It's silly. Everyone knows there's out-of-home viewing. There always has been. It's just another way for them to try to charge us for something that we've been paying for all along."

He called the move hypocritical because when network ratings dropped after Nielsen shifted to a people meter system, the Big 3 argued that network audiences hadn't changed, only the ratings system. □

News briefs in print, electronic and alternative media.

Still shopping around. Home Shopping Network, St. Petersburg, Fla., and competitor QVC Network, West Chester, Pa., have ended talks that could have led to a "possible business combination." The networks said they couldn't reach a mutually acceptable agreement.

Tribune Co. scores twice. Tribune Co.'s KWGN-TV, Denver, signed a five-year deal to broadcast Colorado Rockies Major League Baseball games when the team enters the National League next year. Separately, Tribune won a legal battle when the U.S. Court of Appeals in Chicago decided rules adopted by the National Basketball Association limiting superstations to 20 games a season are an illegal restraint of trade. The NBA had sought to phase out Chicago Bulls broadcasts on Tribune's WGN-TV superstation.

Stride Rite strikes kids ads. Stride Rite Corp. has dropped advertising on Saturday morning children's programming. Instead, the shoe marketer's Stride Rite Children's Group will concentrate on sponsorship of the Public Broadcasting Service's "Long Ago & Far Away." Stride Rite began sponsoring the Sunday morning story program last fall. The division won't cut spot TV spending for campaigns targeting adults. It spent $1.3 million on spot TV last year, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. Of that, $400,000 was directed to kids TV. That money will now go toward the "Long Ago" sponsorship and related promotions, including merchandising and a tie-in with the American Library Association. Stride Rite's Keds and Sperry Top-Sider divisions are unaffected by the change. Grey Advertising, New York, handles all advertising for the parent.

Mainlining. Main Street TV Network, broadcasting primarily through low-power TV stations in the U.S., Canada and Mexico, added 50 affiliates for its May 21 launch, airing a 2-hour live program, "Main Street Across America." The 24-hour network began testing on 50 affiliate stations Jan. 19; its format includes 12 hours of nostalgic programs and 12 hours of first-run syndication.

One famous parent. For the first time in 65 years, Parents is featuring a celebrity on the cover. Kathie Lee Gifford and her son, Cody, are featured in the May issue for Mother's Day. "This will not be a trend," said Ann Murphy, publisher-editor in chief. "We will look at how the magazine sells and the editorial response before we do this again."

MEDIA WORKS

First* sign of relief. First for Women, forced to reduce its rate base three times in three years—most recently to 1.5 million—is seeing ad pages rise. The 16-times-a-year title will carry 273 ad pages for the first half of 1992, up 58.5% for the same period last year. The increase is due to the lower rate base, an increase in frequency from 14 times a year and a new sales program. Bauer Publishing Co., Englewood Cliffs, N.J., publishes First for Women.

Hey U. U. The National College Newspaper will publish two special issues targeted to incoming college freshmen. Welcome to U. and advertisers' product samples will be distributed next month to 750,000 college-bound high school seniors. Back to U. will be published in August with a distribution of 1.425 million copies. U. is distributed monthly during the school year as an insert to 400 college papers. Ad costs for the special issues range from $38,800 for a color page in one issue to $126,000 for a color page and samples in both. □

Dentyne to benefit from line extension, more ad $

By Judann Dagnoli and Julie Liesse

Warner-Lambert Co.'s American Chicle Group was the loser in last year's $1.3 billion chewing gum derby, but the company's bubble hasn't burst yet.

Hurt by too few line extensions and a slowdown in ad spending, particularly behind Dentyne, the No. 2 gum marketer's dollar sales dropped 1% to $310.7 million while unit sales plunged 7% to 59.8 million, Nielsen Marketing Research reported.

Leader Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co. and No. 3 Planters LifeSavers Co. both posted healthy gains.

But Chicle executives have plans to turn things around.

"Our spending has not been what I'd personally like to see, but that's changing," said Joe McDonough, Dentyne senior product manager. "I can guarantee our commitment to Dentyne in 1992 will turn it around."

Chicle spent just $5.6 million in measured media for Dentyne in the first nine months of 1991, compared with $15.7 million for Trident, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. Young & Rubicam, New York, handles Dentyne, and J. Walter Thompson USA has Trident.

Dentyne's dollar volume slipped 1% to $67.6 million, according to Nielsen, while unit volume dropped 6% to 16.1 million.

Chicle's rebuilding plan includes new-product rollouts. That started with the Dentyne line extension Cinn*A*Burst introduced nationally late last year.

The product is designed to appeal to teens, Mr. McDonough said, and is supported by a network TV and radio campaign, themed "May not be suitable for adults."

Separately, regular Dentyne is targeting its 18-to-34-year-old consumer franchise with a TV campaign that shows a man saving an empty park bench for a young woman.

The company wouldn't be specific about other new-product plans. But Chicle last year tested a new brand called Cristal in Houston. The sugarless gum is designed not to stick to dentures and is competitive with Wrigley's test of a sugarless Freedent.

Planters LifeSavers, which increased its 1991 dollar sales 6% to $228.1 million and unit volume 2% to 42.1 million, has been helped by the popular "How long does the flavor last?" campaign from FCB/Leber Katz Partners for CareFree sugarless gum.

The campaign, credited with boosting 1991 brand dollar sales 3% to $134.8 million, will be continued in new executions this spring, said Cheryl Bachelder, VP-general manager. Brand spending for last year is estimated at $15 million.

Planters spent another $3.5 million in measured media in the first nine months of 1991 to support Bubble Yum, via Long, Haymes & Carr, Winston-Salem, N.C.

For the first time in more than a decade, Planters also spent against its Fruit Stripe gum with a $2 million TV campaign, also from Long. The spots revived the product's colorful zebra mascot, Yikes Stripes, after a 21-year absence, Ms. Bachelder said.

Market leader Wrigley also posted good gains in 1991, seeing dollar sales increase 4% to $553.7 million and units rise 1% to 121.1 million, according to Nielsen.

Wrigley's 25¢, five-stick packs and 10-unit multipacks, available on all sugared brands, were a major force behind Doublemint's 2% volume increase to 24.3 million units in 1991, said Ron Cox, Wrigley group VP-marketing.

"The 25¢ packs have offered consumers great value; that better value and continuing strong ad support have helped build volumes on our established sugared brands," he said.

Doublemint spending remained strong at more than $20 million in 1991 when the brand introduced a new campaign from Wrigley agency BBDO, Chicago. Spending behind Wrigley spearmint gum rose 38% to $17 million during the first nine months of 1991. All that was channeled into a smokers' alternative campaign.

But growth for Extra, Wrigley's largest brand in dollar sales, slowed last year. Mr. Cox blamed the softness on the lack of a hot new flavor.

In the late 1980s and in 1990, Extra had grown with the help of flavor extensions like Winterfresh and cinnamon. Most of Wrigley's $15 million to $20 million budget for Extra is supporting Classic Bubblegum flavor, rolled out last fall. □

Riots in Los Angeles were in response to an acquittal for four police officers in the Rodney King case.

A call to admen: Help stop riots

The time to bring the power of advertising to bear on the urban rioting that broke out last week is now.

Those riots paralyzed Los Angeles and shook other cities, following last Wednesday's acquittal of four white police officers who were charged with beating a black motorist.

The violence also may have alienated many of the very people who believed a California jury—which included no blacks—had compounded a great injustice.

The advertising industry finds itself with a monumental opportunity—and obligation—on its hands. There's no faster way to reach Americans than advertising—when media, government and business make it their business to get a message out. And there are few agencies who—when asked—will not make key people instantly available for such a project.

In fact, the entertainment industry is doing just that. Late last week, actor Tom Cruise, rap artist Ice T and others taped public service announcements, and similar anti-violence PSAs by Bill Cosby aired earlier.

There are those who believe the issues involved have nothing to do with the advertising business, that poverty, despair and many forms of racism are
